The ninth century before Christ speaks to the nineteenth century after Christ, and Joel of Judah is the prophet for the present. A terrible calamity, enduring through an entire season, was visited upon Judah, as a judgment of God. And yet it was only a warning, an introductory judgment of greater judgments to follow, unless Judah repented. In wonderful language Joel summons the people to humble themselves and repent. But what had been Judah's sin? Wherein had the people so flagrantly departed from God, as to become the object of such divine warnings, judgments and calls? There were no gross idolatries, no great public immoralities practised, such as had called down the judgments of God upon the chosen people formerly and under later prophets. Everything seemed to be moving prosperously. Wherefore, then, the sweeping calamity, the startling call, followed by all Judah prostrate in repentance before God? What was the sin? None other than indifference—indifference not on the part of surrounding heathen nations, but on the part of God's own people in Zion. To the same people, in the same case, comes the same call to-day:

"Blow the trumpet in Zion,
Sound an alarm on my holy mountain,
Sanctify a fast,
Call a solemn assembly;
Gather the people;
Between the porch and the altar,
Let the priests weep,
The ministers of Jehovah,
And say,
Spare thy people, O Jehovah."

Martyrs of Holland.

BY REV. DANIEL VAN PELT.

III. John Pistorius, of Woerden—His Life and Labors.

WOERDEN is but a little city, with a population of not quite five thousand, in the Province of South Holland, near the borders of Utrecht. It is a place quite unvisited by the ordinary tourist. To the student of history, however, it is a shrine not to be neglected. A walk of about five minutes brings us from the station to a narrow stream, its banks lined with ancient trees. We can hardly be made to believe that this is the river Rhine, yet the maps of Holland assure us that it is. We soon cross a bridge over a canal at right angles to the river, which formerly served as a moat; and what formerly were the walls are here, as in almost every other Dutch city, converted into beautiful promenades and parks with undulating walks or lawns, and planted with fine umbrageous trees.

A walk of a few rods along the main street, not very wide and slightly winding, brings us to a principal cross street. It leads, by means of a boldly curving stone bridge, across the Rhine, as it flows through the city. Soon we stand looking with interest at an exceedingly quaint, old fashioned Town-Hall, and near it is the Reformed church, a huge building surrounded by lofty trees, and facing one of the boulevards or parks formed out of the old fortifications. This church, however, is not the one we want; we have an idea that the Lutheran church must contain the object of our search. We are directed to it; it is near where formerly stood the Leyden Gate, now a mere name. We find it, are shown its curious interior, and then are taken into an "upper room," a sort of vestry or consistory-room. At once we discover that we are in the right place. Two oil paintings adorn the wall; one represents Martin Luther, the other John Pistorius, or John de Bakker.

John, who later in life received the appellation of "de Bakker" (the baker), or in more learned form, "Pistorius," was the son of the "koster" (sexton, or sacristan,) of the "great" Church of Woerden, which is now the Reformed church of the place. This little city, therefore, enjoys the distinction of being the birthplace of the first martyr of the Reformation, whose blood fell upon the actual soil of Holland, and who was martyred for laboring in the Gospel within her borders. For Henry of Zutphen, while a native of what was subsequently the Republic or Kingdom of Holland, labored and died upon foreign soil.

The position of sacristan, or sexton, was not such an humble one at that time (or even now) in Holland as we might suppose. The father of John Pistorius was of a good family, had studied in the same schools with Erasmus, and still enjoyed his personal friendship. He destined his son for the church. At the age of twelve he was sent to Utrecht to begin his studies. Possessing a fine, clear voice, he was employed by the priests of the Cathedral Church to sing in the choir. This somewhat interfered with his studies, but after three years he abandoned the choir and devoted himself exclusively to the preparation for the priesthood. His teacher was John Rhodius, a man of great learning, with decidedly evangelical tendencies, for he was one of the translators of the New Testament which was published in the vernacular at Amsterdam in 1525.* The teacher's views did not remain without their effect upon the pupil, and even at this tender age he was suspected and hated for his supposed sympathy with Luther's doctrine. His father, alarmed at this state of things, removed John at once from Utrecht, and sent him to the University of Louvain. Here he came into contact with the great Erasmus, his father's friend. When he had reached the proper age for ordination, he returned to Utrecht to be consecrated to the priesthood. It was not at all in accordance with his own wishes that he took this office upon him, but, as he declared at his trial, entirely to gratify his father, or rather in obedience to his peremptory commands.

He was appointed to serve in the church of his native town, and took especial pleasure in the instruction of the people. Taking for his text-book a catechism authorized by the Church of Rome, he allowed his interpretations to be entirely guided by the evangelical views he had imbibed early in life and never outgrown. The authorities of the Church at the Episcopal See of Utrecht soon learned of his conduct, and he was ordered to come to the ecclesiastical capital and render an account. He refused to obey. As Woerden was situated within the Province of Holland, the Provincial Court at the Hague was appealed to, and John accused before it of contumacy. As a consequence, the commander of the fortress of Woerden was directed to arrest him and cast him into prison. But he did not remain here long, for the burghers of the city were indignant at these summary proceedings against a resident and native townsman at the instance of accusers in a neigboring Province, and in direct violation of their civil privileges. There was no one found bold enough to repair to Woerden and lay a formal accusation against the evangelical priest, and hence, after awhile, Pistorius was released from prison on condition that he would produce himself whenever wanted for trial. The ecclesiastics at Utrecht were enraged at the escape of their victim. Although impotent to injure him directly, they knew how to annoy him in various ways, and embittered his life to such a degree that he fled the country and went into voluntary exile.

He journeyed to Wittemberg that he might sit at the feet of Luther; and it is interesting to notice how plainly the results of that visit remained apparent in Woerden for many years after the martyr's death. When the days of Romish supremacy in Holland had gone by, and the Reformed Church was everywhere established, this city remained a stronghold of Lutheranism. And so intolerant and vehemently sectarian had the spirit of the inhabitants become in 1579, that one of their preachers, John Scaliger, (who must not for a moment be identified with either of the world-renowned scholars of that name,) no doubt encouraged by the well-known sentiments of his hearers, ventured to go so far as to denounce preachers and members of the Reformed or State Church in the most extravagant terms; even the States-General and William of Orange came in for a great share of this habitual abuse. As a result, he, together with a colleague, were deposed and forbidden to preach within the Province of Holland. The use of the "great" church, hitherto exclusively theirs, was also at this time forbidden to the Lutherans. They were, therefore, compelled to build another house of worship, and henceforth the two confessions were preached side by side in the little city.* Thus it is readily seen that the Lutheran Church in Woerden to-day bears witness to the depth of the impression made by the master mind of Luther upon the young Pistorius during his brief visit, and is a monument to the faithfulness and power wherewith he conveyed that impression to those of his native town, who through his preaching were led to accept the doctrines of the Reformation. Hence the Lutheran Church of Woerden is the shrine where we must honor the memory of this Proto-Martyr of Holland, and hence his portrait as founder of this church is appropriately hung by the side of that of the great Luther himself, as the founder of their sect.

Confirmed in the newer and better faith, and encouraged by the lion-hearted leader of the Reformation to preach it unto priest-ridden and darkened souls at every hazard, Pistorius returned to Woerden. The authorities at Utrecht at once renewed their opposition, demanding his appearance before them to answer a charge of heresy. On refusing to appear, he was sentenced to go to Rome and to remain three years in exile. Heeding the sentence as little as the summons, to elude an attempt to secure his person by violence, he left Woerden and travelled all through the Province of Holland, preaching everywhere the saving doctrines of grace. He then settled down once more in his native town, abandoned the priestly office, married a wife, and resorted to secular occupations to earn his support. He followed the trade of baker for a while, but performed also the labors of agriculture as opportunity offered, to win for himself and wife a respectable sustenance. Nevertheless, the dearest object of his life was not forgotten. In the evenings, on the Sabbath, whenever he had a moment of leisure, he instructed men in the truths of salvation, and sought to rescue them from the superstition of Rome.

While thus occupied there came across his path the same dark shadow of Romish corruption that had aroused the great Reformer of Wittemberg. Learning nothing from the past; regardless of the convulsions that had shaken Europe after the first shameless sale of indulgences had awakened the lion within Luther; hungry only for the gold of Christians, and luring their souls to destruction for the sake of gaining that,—so "the dome of St. Peter might rise a little nearer the sky,"—the Pope insisted upon a renewed effort to secure the purchase of his indulgences throughout Christendom. The movement reached also the little city of Woerden. Pistorius at once resumed the priestly functions and entered the confessional. It was here that Luther combatted this outrage upon Christianity, and here, too, was the most effective battlefield. For to the priest in the hour of confession, the infernal license of the indulgence was presented as a receipted bill for the advance payment of penalties that would otherwise have to be inflicted. Pistorius refused the customary fees, and hence induced a greater number of people to come to him. He would then refuse to honor the Papal indulgence, and impress upon the hearts of men the wickedness of such a scheme, and the real way of obtaining pardon for sins.

Naturally these proceedings excited anew the enmity of the priests and ecclesiastical authorities. He was accused before the Town Council, and summoned to answer before them the charges brought against him. He consented to plead his cause before a number of the clergy, whom he reduced to silence by his unanswerable appeals to Scripture. One of these, however, finding himself outdone in argument, resorted to a never-failing expedient. He wrote an elaborate report of the process to the Regent Margaret, attested by the Town Secretary. By her order Pistorius was immediately seized, conveyed to the Hague, and consigned to prison to await his trial.

Conversion as Shown in the Case of Saul of Tarsus.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ADOLPHE MONOD.

SUPPOSE that a stranger to the Book of Acts were told that there was once a man named Saul who persecuted the Church, sparing neither men nor women; who breathed out threatenings and slaughter against all Christ's followers, compelling them to blaspheme; who followed them relentlessly not only in Jerusalem, but even into foreign cities, seeking to exterminate the whole party; and that afterward the stranger was told of a man named Paul who served the Lord Jesus with more zeal than any other; who lived and who died, like his Master, simply for the welfare of the Church; who, when cruelly tortured by pagans, and still more cruelly by Jews, held his life as of no account, and who, in fact, crowned with martyrdom a career the most active and consecrated the world has ever seen. Could he imagine that these two were one and the same man? Yet such is the fact, and the difficulty of conceiving it measures the distance between a converted and an unconverted man.

Conversion is not simply a reform of conduct. There was nothing in Saul's conduct that required reform. He appealed boldly to the people as witnesses of his life from his youth up. He was correct in habits, honest in business, exact in religious duties, liberal in charities, in a word, respected and honorable. But with all this Saul was still Saul, and Paul had not yet begun. Nor is conversion merely submission to the law. One cannot doubt that Saul was in the true sense of the term a moral man, who subordinated inclination to duty, even to the point of renunciation and sacrifice. He declared to the Philippians that touching the righteousness that is in the law, he was blameless, and for a conscientious Jew that was no trifling matter. But with all this Saul was still Saul, and Paul had not yet begun. Nor is conversion merely the acceptance, however sincere, of certain religious principles. Saul was a zealous Jew, a rigid Pharisee, strict among the strict; obedient to the Scripture, a servant of the true God, hoping for the Messiah, equally scrupulous to obey the statutes of Moses and bold to defend them. But with all this Saul was still Saul, and Paul had not yet begun. Nor is conversion merely a gradual development, a progressive amelioration of certain good qualities in a man. Vain would have been all the development or amelioration of Saul, had it gone on for ages. His excellencies, great as they were, never could have produced that of which they did not contain the germ. Saul must have continued Saul, and Paul would never have commenced.

Conversion is the point of departure for a new life, opposed to the old life in its entire course—which, indeed, is signified by the name, for that denotes a return, a change of direction. Saul did not become simply better, he became another man; he was no more faithful to his principles than he had been, but his principles were changed; what he once counted evil he now counts good, what he once called light he now calls darkness; he personally experienced what he afterward so vividly expressed in the words, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creation; old things are passed away; behold, they are become new." It is a new, unknown, foreign germ that was deposited in the centre of his being. This germ is faith in Jesus, the Christ, the Son of God. Henceforth what he sought in the law he seeks only in grace; what he expected from his own righteousness, he expects only from the righteousness of God in Christ. In fact, see him painted to the life in his own words, at once so filled with truth and so glowing in love: "What things were gain to me, these have I counted loss for Christ. Yea, verily, and I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I suffered the loss of all things and do count them but dung that I may gain Christ and be found in Him, not having a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith." Behold the conversion of Saul; see it shown by its visible fruits, and see it traced to its secret germ. Saul is converted the day, the hour, the moment, when convinced that in himself he is wicked, unworthy, lost and forever deprived of any righteousness before God, he substitutes the name of Christ for his own in all his hopes of eternal life, and casts himself without reserve at the foot of the Cross, as a poor sinner who has no other resource than the blood of the Lamb. But this same Saul from the day, the hour, the minute, he is converted, enters altogether into the mind, the thoughts, the works of that Saviour who redeemed him. It is not only His name that he takes upon him, but it is His righteousness with which he is clothed, and His being to which he is united. As he lives only by Jesus Christ, so he lives only for Jesus Christ, who is become at once the germ and the fruit, the beginning and the end, the Alpha and the Omega of his new life. And every true conversion, beginning like Saul's, ends in the same way. It begins by Jesus Christ living and reigning in the heart before God (2 Cor. 13: 5), and it finishes by Jesus Christ living and reigning in the life before men (1 John 2: 6) whom it compels by the contrast between the old career and the new one to say as was said of Saul at Damascus, "Is not this the man whom we have known so differently? He is so transformed that one can hardly recognize him."

A Great Religious Movement in Philadelphia.

REPRESENTATIVES of all the evangelical denominations in Philadelphia are now earnestly engaged in perfecting plans for a united effort in city evangelization, to begin shortly, and to continue through the winter.

The movement originated in the Philadelphia Ministerial Union, which is constituted of the ministerial associations of the city, and meets quarterly. At the last meeting, in September, a paper was read by the Rev. Dr. R. C. Matlack of the Protestant Episcopal Church, on "Evangelistic Work in Cities." It produced a deep impression, and at the close a resolution was offered by the Rev. James I. Good, of the Reformed Church in the United States, and passed by the Union, calling a general meeting of the city pastors to consider the advisability of a united work during the winter.

Two general meetings of the clergy were held, presided over by the venerable Dr. Richard Newton, of the Episcopal Church. At the second of these meetings it was unanimously resolved that the work be undertaken. A rough draft of a plan was adopted, and a Central Committee appointed to perfect and carry out the arrangements.

It has been decided that the special services shall begin with the second week in January, during which every evangelical church in the city will be open nightly. Union prayer-meetings for the afternoons of that week will be arranged for by neighboring churches to suit their own convenience. Beyond this point the plans are not yet definite; but they contemplate the continuance of the work, as long as the Divine blessing seems to warrant it, in union services in different sections, both day and evening, in churches and public halls.

In the meanwhile preparatory work will be done as faithfully as possible. The city has been divided into six sections, each of which has been placed in charge of a Committee of Management, consisting of the ministers in the section and one layman from each church represented. The sections will be subdivided into districts, which will be allotted to the individual churches for house to house visitation. The visitation will begin simultaneously all over the city on December 1st, and no house will be intentionally passed by. The visitors will be provided with uniform blanks, and arrangements will be made for notifying pastors of the non-church goers in their neighborhood, and of any who may express any church preference. The plans of the Committee on Visitation are not yet perfected, but it is not probable that any minute census will be attempted.

The churches so far represented in the movement are the Baptist, Christian (or Disciples), Congregational, Lutheran, Mennonite, Methodist, Episcopal, Moravian, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Reformed Church in America, Reformed Church of the United States, Reformed Episcopal, Reformed Presbyterian, and United Presbyterian.

Our Church is represented on the North East Section Committee by the Rev. Wm. H. Clark, D.D., pastor of the Second Church, and Elder C. Hunt, of the First Church, and on the Central Committee by the Rev. Wm. R. Taylor, pastor of the First Church.

The Lord's War Waxes Hot.

Address by the Rev. Jacob Chamberlain, M.D., D.D., at the General Missionary Conference, October 26th, 1886.

MR. PRESIDENT, DELEGATES AND FRIENDS: The Lord's war in India is waxing hot. During my previous visit to America, ten years ago, I was wont to tell you of the opening and the progress of the campaign in India. Now we are in the thickest and deadliest of the conflict. Then I told you of the beginnings; now I seek to tell you of the changed circumstances—the change in the aspect of affairs that has taken place since, more than a quarter of a century ago, I first landed in India. To do this effectively I propose, in the briefest terms, to recall to you something of what—in previous addresses before portions of this audience, scattered here and there, that the Lord has allowed me to address—I have told you of our field in India, the country, the people, their religion and environment, and the methods of our work among them, and then to tell you of our present situation, opportunities and responsibilities.

Hindostan and Its People.

India is the home of one-sixth of the whole human race. Reaching as it does from the burning tropical sands of Cape Comorin, within eight degrees of the Equator, up 2,000 miles to the forever-frozen peaks of the Himalaya mountains on the north, and from Afghanistan on the west through 1,800 miles to Indo-China on the east,—we have a country that is inhabited by 252,000,000 of people. India is equal to about one-half of the area of the United States; or to speak a little more accurately, if you draw a line from Dakota south through Texas, India is equal in size to that part of the United States which falls eastward of that line—from Dakota to Texas, from Maine to Florida—and it has five times the population of the whole of the United States.

The Languages.

The people of India are not a homogeneous people—not of one language. It is as if you started in Spain to visit all Europe. Wishing to talk to the inhabitants, you must talk, first Spanish, then Portuguese, then French, then Dutch, then German, then Danish, then Swedish, then Finnish, then Russ, then Polish, then Hungarian, then Bulgarian, Roumanian and Servian, then Turkish, then Greek and Italian, and a great many other languages. And as the people in Europe are as different as their languages, so are the people in India. There are forty languages spoken in India; many of them very ancient languages, very highly-wrought out and polished—beautiful and perfect vehicles for the presentation of Divine truth. And the people are as different as their languages—not of one cast of countenance, not of one ethnological descent.

The Religion.

The religion of the people of India is one. Let me explain it by referring you back to Europe in the time of Martin Luther. When Martin Luther was born there were in Europe so many languages, so many kingdoms, so many different races; but Europe was of one religion—with the exception of the Mohammedan conquerors who had conquered Turkey and still maintained Mohammedanism. Thus it is in India. The religion of India is Brahminism, or Hinduism—with the exception of the descendants of the Mohammedan invaders of some six centuries ago. Of these, 40,000,000 remain in India still, and are Mohammedan, but the rest of the Hindus are Brahminists. Let me remind you also, very briefly, of what Hinduism is. With their ancient Vedas, the most ancient of which was written about the time of Moses, they have some glimmerings of Noachic traditions, and many pure and holy ideas. The Vedas teach in the main a true conception of God, and man, and sin, and sacrifice. But though they have these ancient Vedas, and these purer ideas of God; as man wandered into sin, farther away from God, there came later conceptions of polytheism and idolatry, until at last what there was once of light in Asia has become darkness. The purer religion of the Vedas degenerated into polytheism and idolatry, and their purer morals descended into sensuality and corruption and vice. I speak on this matter as a physician who has treated many thousands of patients, and mingled in their homes from the highest to the lowest, from the Rajah on his throne to the beggar in his hut—when I say that there is no such thing as purity, as virtue, among them. And I have this from the confessions of their best men. "Sir," said a Brahmin with whom I was confidentially talking about this, "sir, there is not a family among us that is not tainted with the impure disease." And honesty in dealings is scarcely known. Caveat emptor is the rule, for honesty is not expected in trade, and no one is disappointed. And as for the truth—although their ancient Vedas, although their poets and sages, call on the people to maintain truth as their choicest heritage, yet there is no truth among the people. The proverbs of the people tell what they are. A common proverb among the Telugu people is, unna marta cheppite ura atsa radu; i.e., "If a man tells the truth, the town will soon become too hot for him." I was once preaching in a Telugu city—the first time the Gospel was preached there—and I said to the people that no matter what their religion might be, all intelligent people accepted certain acts as sinful. I mentioned different points, and then I came to falsehood, and as I went on expatiating upon that, the audience—an educated audience—assented to what I said, and admitted that lying was a sin. "But," said I, "you Hindus tell a lie as often as you tell the truth." "What, sir!" said a Brahmin right before me, "do you say that we Hindus tell a lie as often as we tell the truth?" "Yes," said I, intending to stand my ground. "Sir," said he, "we Hindus tell ten lies for every truth we utter." He certainly told the truth that time. I suppose he must have told ten lies before to counterbalance it.

Caste and the Worship.

Hinduism has two chief bulwarks in this generation. They are, caste and the endowed temples. Caste, you know, is a religious distinction. It is not a social distinction, but one of birth; for Brahma created each caste by a different creation, they hold. The Brahmin holds that he is holier than the rest; and if we admit caste we must allow him to say to the rest: "Stand by thyself, for I am holier than thou." Caste is so firmly rooted that I have known of a Brahmin that died by starvation when there was food placed by his side for him to eat, because, forsooth, that food was cooked by one of a lower caste. "Better die," he said, "and reach heaven, than eat that food and live, and lose caste, and lose heaven." Caste, then, is the adamantine chain which Satan has wound around these people to hold them in that system.

The second great bulwark which supports the system now is its myriads of endowed temples. From Cape Comorin to the Himalaya mountains, they dot every hill-top and every plain, endowed with rich grounds and the choicest lands in former ages. All the revenues of those lands go to the support of the priesthood, who carry on the ceremonies of the temples; and thus, if Christianity prevails, the Brahmins will cease to reap those revenues. Therefore, like Demetrius of old, they call their fellow-craftsmen together and say: "Sirs, by this craft we have our wealth." So the Brahmins lock arms to defend their ancient system against the missionary. I well remember what was said to me after a discussion which we had—another missionary and myself—in the Mysore country, where no missionary had been before, with the chief priest of that region—the President of their theological seminary, if I might use the term, for there were seventy Brahmins studying with him for the priesthood. They had come to meet us in the market-place, and we had discussed for hour after hour before the assembled multitude. He had been pushed to the wall; but at last, darkness coming on, he said there was no time to discuss farther, but he would renew the subject next evening. But before the next evening came, he came secretly around through the rice fields to our tent, and obtained permission to enter. First assuring himself that there was no one else within hearing, he said to me: "Sir, what you said yesterday in the market-place was utterly unanswerable. I did the best I could to defend my own position, surrounded as I was by my own people; but I am not going to meet you again. What you say is so pure, so holy, so good, it appeals so to the highest needs and desires of men, that it seems as if it must be Divine—it must be true—at all events, it must be a better religion than ours. But, sir, we Brahmins cannot afford to let you succeed. Look at our position. We reap rich revenues from all these temples. We are treated as demi-gods by the people. At every festival we receive rich gifts. We are looked up to and worshipped. But let your system succeed, which teaches that there is no human mediator—no mediator between God and man but Jesus Christ—and we Brahmins would drop from our high pedestal down to the level of what we are worth—and you know what that means as well as we do. We would have to drop down from our exalted position and mingle with the ignoble throng. No, sir! Your system must be resisted. It may be Divine; but, sir, we Brahmins have got to fight you." And fight us they did.

The Christian Weapons.

How, then, is such a system, defended by the power of caste and of an endowed priesthood, to be overcome? I cannot delay you to state the particulars of our work at length. I must simply remind you that the Arcot Mission is essentially a preaching mission, aggressively and actively enlightening the people—carrying the Gospel to them in the highways and by-ways, in their towns, villages and hamlets, at the markets and the fairs. We take our tent and pitch it in some central village, and make a tour of the surrounding region, reaching perhaps forty villages before moving our tent to some other place. In that manner we canvass the country and sow seed for Jesus Christ. At a later period we make the tour again, and water the seed. Not only do we preach the Gospel, but we distribute Christian literature, either selling or disposing in some way of tracts and Scriptures wherever we go. And the seed is taking root.

We are reaching the people also by medical work. You know that in the Arcot Mission a number of us—a majority of us thus far, I believe—have been physicians as well as ministers. We have gathered, as you remember, thousands in from all the villages around, simply by the knowledge that if they came their diseases would be healed. They have come from hundreds, from thousands of towns and villages in all directions. Scarcely a day that we do not have those from more than a hundred miles away present in our dispensaries. They hear the Gospel read; they hear the proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; they listen as we raise the voice of prayer to Him who made us and who can save us; they go back to their homes; they take with them the tickets on which are printed a concise statement of Christian truth. They take these with them to their villages, and thus the truth is being scattered where we have never set foot.

Our schools present the truths of Christianity. Heathen pupils come to them with the understanding that they will study what the Christians do. Every one of them studies the Bible, and so we initiate the young into the pure teachings of the religion of Jesus. And then we have our caste-girls' schools, as you know—for, glory be to God! He has brought the mothers and the wives and the daughters of America to the front since I went to India first, to take hold of the work of lifting up their heathen sisters; and we have these girls' schools now, which are filled with the highest caste of Hindu young women. And they all study the Bible, learn our Christian hymns, study our catechisms, and come to a knowledge of the truth in these schools; and thus we are reaching the secluded zenanas everywhere with the truth. And then we have our Anglo-Vernacular schools—a higher style of school—with which we reach young men preparing for the Madras University, and help them on their way in that. In every one of these schools the Bible is studied as a text-book in every class every day; and to show you how it works, let me give you a single incident:

In December, 1883, I received one day a very singular petition. It came from Vayalpad—the county town of the adjacent county. We had no Christians in that county. The petition was brought to me by a special messenger. It was signed by the chief men of that Taluk town, not one of whom was a Christian. They begged me to receive under my charge the Anglo-Vernacular school which they had established the year before for teaching their sons—to receive it under my charge as a mission-school, and to introduce the Bible as a text-book in every class every day. And that petition was signed by heathen. Not a Christian was there—not one lived in the town. Surprised beyond measure, I went out at once to see them, and see if they were in earnest. A meeting was summoned of all interested in the school. A packed room was the result. I read this petition to them. I said: "Is this your wish? It is signed by a number of the people. The request is that the school shall be received under my care, and that the Bible shall be taught in every class every day. You know that I seek your conversion to Christ. I make no secret of that. It will be my aim to present the truth—to present the highest truth that man can conceive of—and with that understanding, do you wish me to receive the school?" The headmaster of the school, who had been educated in a mission school, spoke, telling of what he had learned in that mission school—how he learned to reverence the Bible, and how anxious he was that these, his pupils, should be under Biblical instruction. By experience he knew what the Bible was. Then a native judge—the judge of four counties—spoke. He was a high-caste native gentleman, and finely educated. He could use the English language with as much fluency as I could; and yet he spoke in the Telugu language, because he addressed the audience there assembled. His speech was so remarkable that when I got home I wrote it down in English, and I must read it to you now. He said: "My friends, I was not educated in a mission school, but I have many friends who were, and who studied the Bible daily in school. I have witnessed its effects upon their lives. I have read the Bible myself, privately, a great deal. I have come to know the pure and beautiful system of morality it inculcates. My friends, there is nothing in our Vedas that can compare with it, as I well know from careful examination. Let your sons study the Bible. They need not become Christians; there is no compulsion about it; the missionaries never force any one. But if you want your sons to become noble, upright men, put this school under the charge of the missionary, and have the Bible taught in it daily. It will make your sons better men, and you will be the happier parents. My friends, I have but one son, as you know. On him all my hopes are centered. You know I am able to send him where I please for his education; but I want him to be a noble, earnest man. I have, therefore, sent him to the Madras Christian College to be educated, and there he studies the Bible with the missionaries every day. This tells you what I think of the mission schools, and of the Bible. I have done." That was the speech of a Hindu. By unanimous vote the school was placed under my charge. The Bible from that day was introduced in every class; taught by our catechists; and as I examined the school from month to month before I came home, I found there was no lesson that was learned with more avidity, no examination that was passed better, than the examination of those pupils—those heathen pupils—in the Bible. And so we are reaching these people.

The Results Achieved.

Now, let me remind you of the fruitage that has come thus far. The Arcot Mission occupies a field which is twice and a half as large as the State of Connecticut, with three times the population of that State. And what has the Arcot Mission done there? Thirty-three years ago the mission was begun. It has been carried on for those thirty-three years at an expense no larger than that incurred during the same period in carrying on a single one of our up-town New York churches. The Arcot Mission has cost no more in its entirety for those thirty-three years than it has cost to support one of the uptown churches in the city of New York. And at that expense, what has it accomplished?

We have eight stations occupied. We have 96 Christian villages from which idolatry has been driven out, and where every Sabbath they meet for the worship of the Triune God. These 96 village Christian congregations are formed into 23 organized churches, grouped—two or three, three or four villages forming one organized church. We have a Classis at Arcot, consisting of those 23 churches. And then there are 3,929 baptized members of the Church, including baptized children. We have 1,555 catechumens under instruction for baptism. We have 86 village schools established; and in these there are 2,313 pupils studying the Bible every day. We have six caste-girls' schools in our different stations, for children of the highest classes of the people; and they are attended by the daughters of the highest of the people. In these there are 374 heathen girls studying day by day the Divine oracles. We have four of the Anglo-Vernacular schools of which I have spoken, for the higher education of young men. And then we have six training-schools for training teachers, and Bible women, and catechists, and preachers. There are in those six training-schools for young women and young men 258 boarding pupils, supported—mostly supported—by friends in America in their studies.

Beside those 96 villages and 23 churches, scattered all over our field, we have preached the Gospel, we have sown the seed, we have gone again and again watering the seed in the 7,000 towns and villages lying within our mission boundaries; and our Arcot Mission is reckoned responsible for the cultivation of that whole field—practically, there are no other missionaries working there.

Many Enlightened and Convinced.

The people have become dissatisfied with their Hinduism. They have learned enough of the truth to see that their old religion is not the soul-satisfying system that they supposed it to be. And this is shown in many ways. I will give you one. In my tent, in September, 1879, in the adjacent county of Vayalpad, where there was no Christian, I was preaching the Gospel and had my travelling dispensary with me. A native official, high in office, in caste, and in social position, sent to me by a messenger saying that he would like to see me privately for the treatment of an ailment. I appointed a time. He came to my tent. To my surprise, I found that he had some trifling ailment, the treatment of which was despatched in a few moments. I wondered that he had come, but I soon found he had used that little ailment merely as a cover. He wanted to talk with me on Christianity, and, Nicodemus-like, he had come by stealth. He introduced the subject himself. After an extended conversation on the character and the claims of Jesus of Nazareth to be the Saviour of the world, he said to me in substance: "Sir, I am not a Christian. I am still regarded as a devout Hindu. But in my heart I dare not deny the claims of the Bible. I see the power of Jesus Christ in the lives of His followers so distinctly, that I cannot deny His Divinity. He must be Divine, or He could not work such a change in the lives of those who become His disciples. He is not yet my Saviour. Caste, wealth, position, family, all, hold me back. But even now I never allow Him to be spoken against in my presence. I have long been reading the Bible in secret. The more I read of Christ and ponder over His life and teachings, and the power to conquer sin that comes from embracing His religion, the more do I feel that in the end I shall have to accept Him at any cost as my personal Saviour."

These men must be reached. These men in all our 7,000 towns and villages must be met and personally dealt with. These schools that are asking to be put under our instruction and have the Bible taught in them, must be received, and the Bible taught there, if we are to win that Arcot district for Jesus. The seed we have scattered here and there must be watered, and the field cultivated; and for that purpose, as you see, our Synod has directed that a theological seminary be now established, and that we push the work of raising up native Pauls and Barnabases and Timothys for the work there; and that we are striving to do.

What Remains to Be Done.

And now we come to this aspect of affairs. We are indeed thankful for the great fruitage that we have gathered for the small amount of labor that we have expended there; but what is that among so many? The Arcot Mission is equivalent to all the State of New York south of Troy. We have, as I told you, eight stations scattered through that district, where eight missionaries should be—there are six on the ground now, and two in America—where eight missionaries should be, proclaiming the Gospel and cultivating the field; but what are they in that great district? Suppose New York to be heathen. Place one missionary on Long Island and make that his parish, another in New York, another in Poughkeepsie, another in Albany, another in Utica, another in Binghamton, another in Elmira, and another in Rochester; and then ask why it is that the State of New York is not converted! Grant that there are 96 congregations in the Arcot Mission. People have said: "That field must be nearly converted, isn't it?" Suppose you have got 96 churches scattered all through the State of New York from Montauk Point to Niagara, will those beacon lights be near enough together so that their light can even be seen from one to the other? Why, the darkness will only have begun to be illuminated. We have 23 churches; but what are they for the four millions of inhabitants that we have to win for Christ?

Yes, we have done something; we have made the people dissatisfied with their own system; but we have not yet given them Christ. Said a Brahmin to one of our missionaries out in the farther corner of the field, who was visiting that village for the third time in ten years: "Sir, why do you come to us as you do? You come just often enough to make us dissatisfied with our old religion—you shake our faith in our ancient gods; and you don't come enough to explain your religion to us so that we can intelligently embrace it. Either keep away entirely, or come and bring us to your God and Saviour." And there was truth in what he said.

Scepticism Busy.

They have lost faith in their system; and now Satan comes in, for he is wily. They are dissatisfied with their ancient system, and he brings in the books of John Stuart Mill, and Herbert Spencer, and Huxley, and Bradlaugh, and men of that class—yes, and Thomas Paine. The writings of these men are scattered all through India, and there are presses there running night and day, casting off pages by the million for the poisoning of those awakened Hindu minds. Anything contrary to Christianity will be published by them and scattered through the country broadcast; and now the whole nation is on the eve of coming out of Hinduism and going into—what?

"Sir," said a Brahmin priest to me one day—he had walked in eighty miles to see me; "sir," said he, "Hinduism cannot stand the light that you missionaries are letting in upon it. It is not the soul-satisfying system that we vainly imagined it to be. Sir, Hinduism is doomed. It must go by the board. What are you going to give us in its place?" We were seated under a banyan tree while I tried to teach him the pure religion of Jesus Christ, which I said we were going to give in the place of Hinduism; and as I told him that, my voice faltered—my tongue clung to the roof of my mouth—cold sweat came out upon me. I could not speak. Said I to myself: "Am I telling this man true, or am I telling him false? Are we going to give to India, to those teeming and now awakened millions, are we going to give them the religion of our Jesus? or are we going to awaken them and dissatisfy them with their own system, and leave them to drift out into skepticism or rationalistic Deism or Agnosticism? That is what they are drifting to, and that does not interfere with their caste and their Hindu temples. Shall we let them go out into that? Shall the ruins of Hindu temples be built up into temples for Satan, or temples for the Most High God?

Our General Synod has directed the Arcot Mission to inaugurate measures for consolidating the workers there into one body, that shall go forward and plant the Church of Jesus Christ in India without being tied to any Occidental mother. We are anxious to do so. We are now beginning to clasp hands preparatory to the final attack upon the enemy's strongholds. We have gained those strategic points throughout all India—the Arcot Mission is but a sample—we have gained those strategic points; the campaign is planned; and now we are anxious to make the final assault. The enemy are weakening. Their fortresses are undermined, and they know it. Already we see them loosening the halyards to haul down the flag, and surrender to the oncoming army of Jesus, if we make a vigorous assault; but we are too weak to do so; and we send back an appealing voice to our home churches in all the lands that support us, and beg of them to send on the reinforcements, that we may now make the final assault.

We listen for the reply, and what is it that comes to our ears; what do we hear? "Hold on! You are going too fast. The Church at home can't afford to let you advance any farther. Hold what you have got if you can; but the Church of Christ is too poor to let you go on to the assault for final victory." O merciful Jesus! is it thus that we, redeemed by Thy precious blood—we, for whom on Calvary Thou didst cry in agony, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me,"—we, bought by the blood-sweat drops in Gethsemane—is it thus that we show the measure of our love to Thee?

O Church of the living God, awake! arouse from your lethargy and spring to the fray! Give your sons and your daughters to this work for the Divine Master. Consecrate to Him your silver and your gold. Fill up the mission treasuries to the overflow. Let a shout go forth that shall leap over seas and continents, and come to the ears of your waiting hosts in those distant lands. What shall it be? Shall we catch the cry: "March onward! Seize every point of vantage. Call upon the enemy to surrender. Reinforcements are on the way; supplies in abundance are coming. March on and conquer the land for Christ!" Let that word come, and within the lives of us who are here we will show you India bowing low at the feet of our Jesus.

City Evangelization.

Address of Rev. W. W. Clark at the General Missionary Conference, October 27th.

IN considering the interest of home missions, city evangelization is an important factor. While planning to send the Gospel to the ranches, the prairie village and the mining town, we must not forget the large cities. In this enthusiasm for the welfare of the far West we should not overlook the wants of the near East. While heeding the Macedonian cry that comes from the dug-outs of Dakota and the shanties of Nebraska, we should not stop our ears to the stifled cry of our crowded tenements and dens of iniquity.

West of the Mississippi the question seems to be, "How are we to provide ministers and churches for the people?" but on this side of the great river the question is, "How are we to provide people for the ministers and the churches?" We are touched to the heart when we hear of the homeless pastors and churchless congregations along our trans-continental lines; but are we moved at the sadder sight of half-filled churches and almost empty prayer-rooms in the beautiful edifices at home?

I tell you, brethren, one of the surest and quickest ways of filling the treasury of the Domestic Board, and through it planting these needed churches and parsonages (of which we have just heard so much) is to fill the existing churches and chapels in the large cities. Bring the unsaved here to accept the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and they will burn with the desire to send the same good news throughout the length and breadth of the land.

There is no excuse for ignoring the benighted immigrant who settles at our very doors, while we are so solicitous about his brother who has travelled a thousand miles away. They who have taken up their abode under the shadow of Castle Garden or within hearing of the Trinity chimes, should not be neglected because of a greater interest in the inhabitant of the prairie and the dwellers in the mountain. The evangelization of the cities, large and small, is the crying need of the Church and country to-day.

In considering this problem we propose two questions: "How shall the churches be aroused?" "How shall the masses be reached?"

1st. To arouse dormant churches the pastor must first be aroused. A lady said the other day, "If I had a paper to read at this convention my subject would be, 'How to Evangelize Our Ministers;' if we can only get them stirred up to the needs of the work the people will respond." Surely this is the first step. The truth is, a church as a whole seldom rises above the spiritual level of the pastor. If he be dormant on the subject of missions or home evangelization, his people will have but little interest in either. If he teaches that "charity begins at home,"—and should stay there—they will never be imbued with the missionary spirit. If, therefore, your pastor be asleep on these great themes, wake him up. If he be thoughtless or indifferent, stir him up. And this spiritual awakening in a church will be followed by more self-denial, more liberal giving, more prayer and more heartfelt interest in the Lord's work at home and abroad. We all need to be revived, quickened into new zeal for the Master's cause.

If any of you feel that this cannot be brought about by the usual means of grace, employ means that are not usual. Look for help from outside. I believe most heartily in the office and specific work of the evangelist. If he be an intelligent, prudent, godly man, deeply taught in the Scriptures, filled with the Holy Ghost and burning with love for souls, he will be a blessing to your church and community.

2d. How shall the masses be reached? Go for them. Let them know that you care for their souls. Tell them, if you can, of the earnest, faithful and interesting preaching. Interest them also in the singing—ask them to help you in this service. The study of human nature proves that people are more pleased to grant a request than to receive a benefaction. It is such individual work as this that tells. Go from house to house and show an interest in their souls.

Thirty years ago seven Christian men met in a shop in the city of Hamburg and determined to evangelize the city and the country round about. The result was, fifty churches were established, nearly half a million Bibles distributed and ten thousand souls brought into the Church. But this required work—patient, prayerful, self-sacrificing, persistent work. And this must be done if the Church is to be saved and the State preserved.

We are importing elements here antagonistic to our national institutions, opposed to God, averse to law and order—a people who have no fear of the policeman's club, the bullet or the halter. The only hope is in softening their hardened hearts by the story of Jesus' love.

Look at the cities of Paris and Marseilles and see how the ranks of the communists have been lessened by the McAll Mission and preaching stations. Such mission stations are needed in our land.

One who has had great success in city evangelization lately said: "This is our only hope. If we Christians in the large cities do not go for the masses, the masses will soon go for us." Yes, if we do not go to their homes with the Bible and Gospel, they will come to ours with the pistol and torch. There is an element of self-preservation in this work. The masses must be evangelized to save the Church and protect the State. Both our civil and religious blessings are threatened by the growing spirit of atheism and anarchy.

There are two great forces at our command—Church and State, and with these we can meet our foes. We cannot destroy them, but we can hold them in check and say: "Back! thus far shalt thou go and no further."

The power of the State is limited. It can make laws to meet these dangers and it can enlist enough policemen to enforce its laws. This is all the State can do and this is all that you as citizens can do. You can cast your ballot for the law, and you can empty your pocket-book to pay for the policemen.

Now turn to the Church. Here is hope. Let a new tide of spiritual life be infused into our churches. Let the Gospel be preached in the slums of our cities, let the standard of the Cross be raised and let the old story of Jesus and His love be told to the most hardened sinners, and this will succeed where the law and the club signally fail.

Our Government is now planning to expend five to ten million dollars to deepen the channel at Sandy Hook bar, for the benefit of the great foreign vessels, while she cannot spend a cent to make channels for the Gospel for our people. We import foreigners by the million who populate our cities and make our laws. On their arrival the devil furnishes them with rum, the anarchist gives them dynamite and a pistol. Who will give them the Gospel? This is left for us. There is no one else to do it. Will we do it? This remains to be seen.

Finally, What shall be the outgrowth of this convention? Let its influence be felt at once in our homes and in our churches. The Lord's claims upon us are plain, imperative and immediate. A knowledge of the facts should make us realize our responsibility in the matter. But it is as Ruskin says, "We buy our peace with forgetting," except now and then, when we happen to be waked up as we are to-day. A fire of enthusiasm has certainly been kindled in every soul at this convention. A burning, flaming torch has been put into the hands of each delegate to carry home that he may set on fire the lifeless embers and members of our drowsy churches.

Brethren, what do you propose to do with these torches, with this enthusiasm kindled here? Will it soon die out or will you start a fire at once in the hearts of those at home who have not enjoyed these privileges? Let us tell our people of what we have seen and heard. Let us arouse them to a sense of their personal responsibility in this matter and set them to doing something. Let us have anything but lethargy and indifference.

A few weeks ago I greeted a fellow pastor, at the Synod's Rooms at Vesey street, and taking him cordially by the hand said, "Are you still at B.?" "Yes, my brother," he replied, "you have expressed it exactly. I and my people are very still at B." Now, I take it, as this expressed the condition of most of us, the object of this gathering is to break up this stillness. Let this be our cry, "O, Lord, revive us again, that Thy people may rejoice in Thee." We need a real old-fashioned revival of religion, begun in prayer and founded on God's promises. Let us have a burden for the lost souls around us and they will be reached.

The world is always looking for novelties and likes to see life in anything. If we can show them the novelty of a live, active, progressive church, the novelty of an interesting, attractive, soul-refreshing prayer-meeting, the people will want to come in and your community will be evangelized before you know it.

The first impulse of a quickened Christian and of a newly converted sinner is the desire to tell and send the good news to others. Faithful witnessing in Jerusalem, (the church at home,) was immediately followed by sending the Gospel through Judea and Samaria, (Domestic Missions,) and soon Antioch, Asia Minor and the uttermost parts of the earth were reached. In a word, if our churches are revived, if our towns and cities are evangelized, the two great Boards of our Church will not suffer for lack of men and means to carry on their respective work.

Coming up our beautiful harbor this morning I was more than ever impressed with the significance of the new Statue of Liberty which is to be unveiled to-morrow. There she stands, with her feet upon a solid foundation, immovable, regardless of storm and tempest, holding forth the torch and from its apex flashing light upon three great cities and illuminating the surrounding darkness. The Apostle must have had in mind some such figure as this when, addressing the saints at Phillippi, he said, "In the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, shine ye as lights in the world, holding forth the Word of life."

Brethren and sisters, let us take our stand on the rock Christ Jesus, let us be strong to endure, let us hold forth the Word of life. And above all, let our light shine upon these benighted homes around us, darkened by sin and sorrow, and thus will we be the means of enlightening the world and of delivering many lost souls "from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God."

The Immediate Evangelization of America.

Extract from the Address of the Rev. Denis Wortman before the Conference on Wednesday Afternoon.

HAVE we not come to the kingdom for such a time as this? With our crisis comes there not a corresponding help of God, and with it shall there not come our corresponding enthusiasm? Aye, shall we not rise gladly to the full height of our occasion, and make our liberty and our laws, our institutions and our affluent wealth, an energetic Church and the simple Gospel of the Cross, all to fullest measure, contributive to the immediate evangelization of America?

Yes, we must, and we will. So need we, and so must we, to save our sacred institutions of liberty, to conserve our nineteenth century civilization, to preserve our very Christianity. Our own work in our own land we must faithfully and instantly do, if we would carry forward that sister work, so cherished, of sending the Gospel to foreign lands. It is a suggestive fact in history that the early Christians of Ireland were they to whom Germany was indebted, from the fifth to the ninth century, for the most successful and evangelical work among her people, so that it is truly said, "the seed of the Lutheran Reformation was sown in Germany by Irish missionaries." Sad the thought that by and by darkness settled down upon that land, rests there now, and settles over us as her peasants thicken in our land. But the teaching of her Columbanus along the Vosges, her Callich in Alemannia, her Kilian in Thuringia, her Trudpest in the Black Forest, lived again in the Reformation, is preserved to our day in the churches of Protestantism; and now, in the German immigrant, and in us, the children of the Reformation, the sons of our Celtic missionaries are met by the sons of their Continental converts! God help us to pay back our Gospel indebtedness in full.

To me there is a certain pathos in such a reflection. One feels an unusual tenderness toward the one in his bigotry, and the other in his scepticism; and to us, children mayhap of both, and in whom we trust, is preserved the very faith the ancestor of the one preached to the ancestor of the other, opens here on these favored shores an opportunity, unwonted in the centuries, of re-introducing these peoples to each other in love, and reintroducing them to their pure ancestral faith! Here ceases all thought of strife, of discord, of peril; and somehow we feel a reverent assurance, God is indeed meaning America for Christ.

Touched by the very pathos of our situation, fired with patriotic zeal, and urged on by a thorough Christian devotion, it seems to me we cannot fail to enter loyally and at once upon our work, and make any sacrifice to insure its success. We will remember how noble a foundation of liberty and religion our fathers laid, and we will have all the structure equally grand. We will remember the early traditions, and we will see to it that they shall not find reversal in our future history. We will think with gratitude of the full resources of this land in its rich mines and its broad acreage, and highly resolve they shall not be the possession of infidelity, or superstition, or luxury, or anarchy. We will reflect how, if America is not for Christ she is against Him, and bend every energy to her redemption from such large hurtfulness. We will behold the foreign peoples crowding to our shores, but shall not be so much dismayed by their appearance, but render thanks to that Divine Providence that brings them within our influence, and simply exult in spending and being spent in their conversion to God. We will think, unappalled, of the perils possible through them, trusting by God's grace to make their heterogeneousness, their multitudinousness, their peculiarities, all contributive to the advancement of His kingdom; we will not fear, because, in such a tremendous process as all this, there shall come about an amalgam of now separate Christian communities or a certain differentiation, not of doctrine, but of dogma, not of Christ, but of ecclesasticism; and will gladly merge individual and ecclesiastical prepossessions in the united effort of a united Christiandom for the hastening on of the dominion of our Lord. We will think of the enormous increase of the world's wealth, and the immediate, pressing claims of the Gospel, and lay all our wealth as well as all our labor, at the Saviour's feet. We will remember how the very rapidity with which the apostolic preaching was pushed on, was the cause of its success, so that "in five years after the death of Jesus, all Palestine had heard the Gospel from the mouth of missionaries sent out from Jerusalem," and will wisely plan for nothing less than America's immediate evangelization. We will take courage from our work abroad; and as in British India the number of Christian communicants increased from 22,400 in 1852 to 78,494 in 1878, to well-nigh 100,000, to say nothing of the millions brought under Christian teaching and influence, and as in Britain the public interest in foreign missions has so greatly increased that in place of the £50,000 of 1800, 1882 supplied £1,000,000; so we shall hope that, love for country and love for Christ conjoining here, shall lead us to increase indefinitely our contributions, and with them God will increase indefinitely their efficiency, and the twentieth century of the Christian era shall open with our national redemption well begun, and close with its consummation, joyful and complete. If we be but faithful, we have Christ's promise of help, and history's endorsement of His pledge.

The Gospel that without arms subdued the Roman Empire, that without earthly wisdom supplanted the theologies of Greece, the Gospel that from age to age went on saving the vicious, reforming the family relations, abolishing slavery and serfdoms, made possible the Justinian Code, made woman man's equal, equalized proprietary rights, substituted the peace of God for private war, did away with wager of battle, and torture, and wreckage, and piracy on land and sea, that civilized barbarians, had the inherent energy to reform a corrupted church, inaugurated temperance reform, established hospitals, asylums, retreats, gave inspiration to art, led the way for all our later science, made the nineteenth century possible, this religion of law, of liberty, of love, of Christ, shall have no fear as it confronts the possibilities of our country and time, but, under God, shall rise equal to this emergency, and show how invincible is truth, how omnipotent is Christ.

But, we must not mistake. This Gospel shall come in no bodiless way; it must be incarnated in Christian workers, in men and women inspired with the love of Jesus. If we be idle the cause goes backward, and will need other centuries and better men. We must appreciate our present opportunity and duty, and meet it with true heroism. Prejudice, indifference, pride, hopelessness, mere ecclesiasticism, miserliness, we must lay aside, and be instant at our work. The time for pennies and dimes has gone by. He who gave a dime shall have to give his dollar, and he who gave his one dollar now his five, and he who gave his ten must give his fifty and his hundred—and there must be no retreat, and no littleness. The country that has $3,000,000,000 invested in manufactures, that in a single year works up $3,500,000,000 of raw material into manufactured products, and makes a clear gain of over $1,000,000,000; the country that gave its government $4,000,000,000 to sustain its unity, will surely shortly rise above its present parsimonious allowances for saving it for the kingdom of her Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ!

One naturally calls to mind an incident at the beginning of our lamentable Civil War. The President had made his call for the first great war loan. His great Secretary of the Treasury visited New York and met a council of the bankers of the metropolis. He laid before them his request. They knew not how to meet it. They sat in silence, thoughtful, perplexed. At last, quick as a flash uprose the youngest man of them all and exclaimed, "Gentlemen, it is not a question whether we can afford the country this loan or not. We must afford it. If the government is preserved your money is safe. If the government is not preserved, where is your money, where your banks, your commerce, your institutions? I move we grant the loan." And the motion was immediately and unanimously carried. Oh, Christians of America, the country is in peril, God wants your largest possible loan; He wants it at once. You may not question whether you can afford it or not. You must; and therefore you can. If this country is saved, then your property, your institutions, your children are safe; but if this country be lost, there is nothing left to you—of wealth or of labor, of family, of civilization, of Christianity, of hope! I move you that we grant the loan!

Mrs. Tallboy's American Board Guests.

"IF ever I open my house again to strangers, you'll catch a white blackbird!" exclaimed Mrs. Tallboy, as she came upstairs. She was flushed and tired. All the morning she had been in the kitchen, the oven door opening and shutting with a bang, and the air resounding with the beating of eggs and pounding of crackers. It was the first Tuesday in October. The great annual meeting of the A. B. C. F. M. was to be held in C. this year, and this was the day when it would begin, with its influx of visitors from every part of Christendom. "There is an ocean of things to be done yet," continued Mrs. Tallboy to her aunt, who had just dropped in for a moment, "and I'm tired to death now." She sat down in an attitude of utter dejection, with an armful of fresh towels in her lap.

"Louise," said Aunt Eliza, "it's because you won't give up your besetting sin. You can't look me in the face this moment and deny that you've been making three kinds of cake when one would do, and rolling croquettes like Martha, instead of giving your guests cold ham like Mary. How many are you going to have?"

"Four! Fool that I was to say that I'd take so many when the committee came round last spring! A minister and his wife from Fileno, Me.—wherever that may be!—and a home missionary and his wife from out West somewhere."

"Well, dear, it's not for your own pleasure you undertake it. Don't forget that, and I'm sure the Lord will help you through."

"Faith and fatigue never go along together with me, I find," answered Mrs. Tallboy, taking up the towels with a sigh

She got through with all that her high ideals of housekeeping demanded barely in time to dress herself and meet her guests, when they arrived before tea, with a smile, which, to their eyes, bore no suspicion of forcing. The Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Brock, of Fileno—he tall and thin, with a gentle stare over his spectacles, as if he called back his ideas from another world with an effort; she, thin also, but small, worn and anxious-looking, in a well-preserved black dress of the style of a dozen years back, and an aggressively high, showy, feather-laden bonnet—presented by the village milliner for this occasion—that bore no relation whatever to the meek, little head under it with its knot of thin, gray hair, and face so patient and sweet. Mr. and Mrs. Hayward, the other two, were younger and more sprightly, with a heartiness and Western frankness that stood out in striking relief from the quiet, subdued manner of the Brocks.

The supper was excellent and went off well. That lifted Mrs. Tallboy's spirits a little, as did also her husband's cheerfulness at the sight of his well-filled table. But the fatigue was still there, and the rebellion that she had consented to all this trouble for perfect strangers. She had given up her own room to the Brocks. When she went to bed, she had to go to a closet off their room for her slippers. Through the partition she overheard—involuntarily, at first—this conversation.

"Josiah, isn't this a beautiful room! Why, I can't help thinking all the time that it's just a dream, my being at a Board meeting. How stunned I was when Mrs. Marvin said to me that morning, 'Mrs. Brock, the whole parish is bound you shall go this year,' and clapped that money into my hand. Won't they all be pleased when they hear what a delightful family we were assigned to."

"Yes," answered the minister's slow, high-pitched voice, "we're highly favored every way, Amanda. Mrs. Tallboy seems to be really delighted to have us"—here he paused as if hunting for something, "I was almost afraid you'd forgotten my clean collar for to-morrow, but I've found it in the bottom of the bag. You know you were so excited, dear, yesterday, when you were packing—it wouldn't have been strange."

"Well, and it's nothing to wonder at if I was," answered the other gentle voice, as if half laughing. "It's the first outing I've had for fifteen years, you know." Then she went on excitedly, "O Josiah, to think that for three whole days not a hand's turn to do, and I'm going to those grand meetings, and shall hear and see men I've read of all my life! And then the music from such a great congregation! Why, it just took me off my feet at the meeting to-night! And such a lot of old friends as one keeps coming across that you haven't seen for years! And then to-morrow we are going around a little, between times, to see the city and the sights. I declare, Josiah, it does seem too much for me!"

"No, Amanda," answered the minister's voice, with a tearful quiver in it, "you deserve every bit of it. Let us kneel right down now, and thank the Lord for His great goodness to us."

Mrs. Tallboy left the closet softly, and her eyes were running over when she went back to her husband. "I'm ashamed of myself for listening, and yet I'm glad I did. I never should have dreamed how happy we were making these good Christians, putting pleasures into their lives they will never forget. What am I—ungrateful, fretful creature!—that such a privilege should have been given to me and my house! Why, this sweet, frail-looking woman has eight children, she told me at tea, and her husband's salary was raised this year to eight hundred dollars! And she hasn't been away from home for a single day for fifteen years. Oh, won't I see that she has a good time now! And I begin to like the Haywards, too, such frank, whole-hearted people, no trouble at all to entertain. John"—with a little sob—"let us kneel down together, as we used to when we were first married."

It was a happy but tear-stained face that Mr. Tallboy kissed when they rose from their knees.

Somehow the guests did not seem after that like strangers, but friends. And the meetings where thousands met, filled with a single thought, were full of inspiration and kindled a glow that made the minor vexations of life too small to be noticed. When the hour of parting came on Friday, it was with real regret that Mrs. Tallboy watched the retreating forms and valises disappear down the street.

The next spring came a letter from Mr. Brock announcing the death of his wife.

"I knew, dear friends, you would sympathize with me in my great bereavement, though you knew my wife so little, and I wished to tell you that the brightest spot in her last year was the time of the Board meetings at your house. It seems that she already suspected what suffering was before her. But those days of rest and real pleasure were like a special blessing sent before her trial. She often spoke of them in her last, terrible illness. I never can thank you enough that you gave them to her."

Mrs. Tallboy could not speak as she handed the letter to her husband.

Three years after the Tallboy's son—a wild boy went West, much against their wishes. In a few months he was taken ill, and consumption, long in his system, seemed inevitable. It was a long, sad journey for the anguish-stricken parents, their only hope to reach him before he died. At the station, in the little far-off settlement, what should first greet their astonished eyes, but the cheerful, red-whiskered face of Mr. Hayward!

"Your son is at our house!" he exclaimed, with a hearty grip of his strong hand, first one, then the other. "We have a room all ready for you. Keep up your courage. I think he is going to pull through."

Who can picture the thankfulness of that mother's heart when he told her how, in hearing her son's name, Halifax Tallboy—"there's luck in odd names as well as numbers sometimes," he said, smiling—he had gone at once to the ranch where he lay, dying of poor care and poor fare, and brought him home that very day to his wife, though they had moved into their rough, little house but two days before, and were still "all in a heap,"

Already the beautiful nursing they had given him was telling on him, so the doctor assured Mr. Tallboy. Quite as much as the signs of returning health, the parent's hearts bounded to see in their wayward boy a new humility of spirit, and a thoughtfulness for others.

The next afternoon Mr. Tallboy was sitting in happy silence beside his steamer chair, on the little porch, facing the glorious mountains. He took her hand softly. "The night Mr. Hayward brought me here I fainted from weakness, and they both thought I was dying. He kneeled down by me and prayed for me—and for you, mother. I never heard such a prayer. It went to my heart, that and his kindness before. I said to myself then, for the first time in my life, I, too, will be a Christian, whether I die or live, and I mean it still, mother."

Can you not imagine the depth of feeling in Mrs. Tallboy's voice, as she said to her husband that night: "Oh, what if I had refused to take any guests at the meeting of the Board!"—S. H. Gilman, in the Advance.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“THE LIFE OF CHRIST.” By Rev. William Hanna, D.D. 3 vols. It can hardly be necessary to do more than call attention to this new edition of a work which is already well known. It has long been recognized as one of the most successful attempts to expand and illustrate the Gospel history in a form adapted to the needs of the average lay reader. The clearness and attractiveness of Dr. Hanna's style, the popular way in which the results of modern scholarship are presented, and the rich practical suggestions which abound throughout the work serve to make it as attractive as it is useful—especially to the unscholarly Bible student. The present edition is neatly printed in large type, is very handy in form and is issued at a very moderate cost. (Carters.)

....“ORIENT: With Preludes on Current Events.” By Joseph Cook. This is a new volume of the Boston Monday Lectures. The author treats of Palestine and Egypt, of advanced thought in India, of Hindus Theism, of woman's work for woman in Asia, of Japan and its reforms, and of Australia and the Pacific. His lectures are always interesting and sometimes instructive. His account of Kerhub Chunder Sen is remarkably clear and satisfactory, and his outlook upon the world's future is cheerful and animating. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

....“STORM SIGNALS.” By Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. The twenty sermons contained in this volume are, with one or two exceptions, addressed to the impenitent, and expound and enforce the stirring appeals of God's Word with that simplicity, earnestness and directness which characterize all Mr. Spurgeon's work. The publication of such sermons serves a good end in furnishing very suggestive studies to ministers, and also may bring the Gospel message to the attention of some who are not reached by the voice of the preacher. (Carters.)

....“THROUGH UNKNOWN WAYS; Or, the Journal Books of Mrs. Dorothea Studley.” By Lucy Ellen Guernsey. A diary supposed to have been written 1684–1686 by an English lady, and dedicated by the authoress to her Bible class at St. Luke's, Rochester. It is intended to show how God leads through ways before untrodden and unknown, often against one's choice and hopes, yet wisely and well into a “haven of rest and peace.” The volume is one of a series of “Historical Stories” by the same writer. (Thomas Whittaker.)

....“INDIA REVISITED.” By Edwin Arnold. An account which is written by an ardent admirer is as little likely to claim our confidence as one which is animated by hostile prejudice, but the former will, almost certainly, be the more agreeable to the reader. The author avows himself not only an admirer but even an ardent lover of India. He not only looks on the bright side of everything, but often seems oblivious to the fact that there is a dark side.

His tour through the country was evidently a very delightful one, and, described in his bright, animated style, furnishes a very interesting series of pleasant pictures. The incidents of travel, the places visited, prominent buildings, and eminent persons are presented to the reader in a very attractive form. Even his enthusiastic and somewhat extravagant laudation of Buddhism and its votaries is not devoid of interest.

The drawback to one's pleasure in reading the book is the consciousness that there is another and very different—a much more sad and sombre—side of Indian character and life, of which we have no hint in these pages. The picture is probably fair enough from the standpoint the author takes, but a change in the position of the observer would give a very different and far more accurate view of the land and its people. (Roberts Bros.)

....“Cassell's National Library” keeps on on its steady course by its weekly issue of reprints of some of the very best literature. The last four numbers contain: “THE SORROWS OF WERTER,” Dr. Samuel Johnson's “LIVES OF THE POETS,” Lessing's “NATHAN THE WISE,” and John Bunyan's “GRACE ABOUNDING.” Every sort of taste can surely find something to its liking in this varied assortment. (Cassell & Co.)

....In writing “CHILDREN'S STORIES OF AMERICAN PROGRESS,” Henrietta Christian Wright has done good service to the rising generation of readers. Beginning with the time when the country west of the Ohio was an almost unexplored wilderness, and Daniel Boone and his compeers made themselves illustrious, and coming down to a sketch of the condition of the South after the War of the Rebellion—the book is, in reality, a brief account of our history during the last century. Of course the stories of the first steamboat, the first railroads, and the invention of the telegraph find each an important place, while principal political events are included. The book is written in clear, graceful style, and is a fitting counterpart to the “Stories in American History,” by the same author. Twelve illustrations. (Chas. Scribner's Sons.)

....“HER CHRISTMAS AND HER EASTER.” By Rev. Edward A. Rand. The story of a fishing town with a light-house in its harbor, and Maggie Searle, the light-keeper's daughter, striving to lead a Christian life, furnish the scenes and incidents of this excellent book. We commend it for the library of the home or Sunday-school. It is pervaded with a sincere Christian desire to magnify vital religion. (American Tract Society.)

....“THE CHESTER COTERIE.” By Kate Livingston Hamilton. This little book is especially worthy of perusal by the young, as it tells, in a winning way, the story of how a circle of young people contrived, by honorable methods, to raise money for church purposes, and, better than all, how they solved the higher problems of self-consecration and of noble service for Jesus. It ought to be in every S. S. library. (Presbyterian Board of Publication.)

....“VAGRANT VERSES.” By Josephine Pollard. Under this title Miss Pollard has published a dainty volume of brief poems, many of which have already become favorites through the periodical press. The verses are both grave and gay, inspiriting and consoling. The little book is admirably suited to lie upon a parlor table, where it may beguile the moments of a waiting visitor, and perhaps drop a good seed of faith or hope in some mind just in need of such help for life's warfare. (Phillips & Hunt.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

...The Forum for November opens with a thoughtful paper by Dudley Field on Our Political Methods, a matter of grave importance at this day. Dr. Leonard Bacon slashes fiercely “Prohibition, So-Called.” President Dwight, in giving account of his education, assigns all possible honor to his parents. Mr. Brockway furnishes useful suggestions upon The State and the Criminal. Prof. Thurston explains the action of oil in moderating ocean waves, and Mr. Purroy compares intelligently the fire services of England and America. The whole number is timely and good.

....The Lutheran Church Review for October has two historical articles, one on the Wittenberg Concord, the other Dr. Kunze's account of the Lutheran Church, published in 1795. Dr. Pick translates from the German of E. Trumpp, the Book of Baptism of the Ethiopian Church. Prof. Weidner has a good paper on Obadiah, but we wonder that he does not refer to Archdeacon Perowne's little volume on that prophet in the Cambridge Bible for Schools. A clever article on Christian Liberty seems to teach that the law is abolished for believers, which neither is, nor can be, the case, while God remains God, and man remains His creature. The notices of recent publications are few, but careful.

....St. Nicholas for November contains a special entertainment in the shape of four of Victor Hugo's Tales to his Grandchildren, with an account of his manner of telling them, by Brander Matthews. Miss Louisa M. Alcott gives also a delightful tale of child-life, called “The Blind Lark.” “Boring for Oil,” is an interesting article full of instruction, and the Dog Stories are sure to be read by everybody.

....It is enough to say of the Popular Science Monthly for November that it contains an article by Prof. J. S. Newberry, of Columbia College, on North America in the Ice Period; Sir William Dawson's address, as President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, on the Geology of the Atlantic Ocean; an account, by Prof. C. A. Young, of Princeton, of Recent Advances in Solar Astronomy; and a paper by Grant Allen, on Thistles. The portrait and biography are of Prof. Holden, of the Lick Observatory. The editor wisely condemns confidence in “luck.” He might have written much more sharply, but perhaps smooth words are the best. The sketch of the life of the veteran French chemist, entitled Chevruel at a Hundred, and written by William H. Larrabee, must not be overlooked. Chevruel in August last observed his 100th birthday. The number is the first of the 30th volume, and is one of the best of a long series.

...A very pleasing portrait of Thomas Pownall, British Governor of Massachusetts, greets the reader on the first page of the Magazine of American History for the month, and is followed by a well-written biography of this distinguished Englishman, the work of Mr. Robert Ludlow Fowler. It is curious that an accomplished gentleman, as Pownall certainly was, should have been guilty of an epitaph in such an atrocious style as that he wrote for the tomb of his wife. The article includes two landscape drawings by the Governor and a fac simile of his handwriting. The continuation of Historic Homes, written by Mr. James G. Burr, treats of The Hermitage, the residence of the Burgwin family, on Cape Fear River, North Carolina. Braddock's Defeat, by T. J. Chapman; Virginia's Conquest—The Northwestern Territory, by J. C. Wells; The Split at Charleston in 1860, by A. W. Clason; Mr. Alfred E. Lee's indirect vindication and Prof. Allen's condemnation of Gen. Pope, aid in making up an uncommonly interesting number.

....Outing with its record of canoeing, cycling, tennis, yachting and other out-door sports prolongs the joys of the summer. We fight the international contest again as we read in the November number Mr. Charles E. Clay's careful discussion of the “Mayflower” and “Galatea” Races. Mr. Stevens transports us to the borders of tropical Asia as he continues the story of Around the World on a Bicycle. We are amused and vexed as we receive the account of his experiences with Koords, Turks and Persians. We surrender ourselves to Capt. Coffin as he reels off another chapter, and a very interesting one, of the History of American Yachting. The College Boy winds up this section of his trip around the world with some statements in regard to Christian missions in China which it is hard to believe. He says of the teacher of a mission school, “Her salary is about $1,000, which enables her out here to live on a scale that would be impossible at home under $10,000.” We know that to be untrue. If other parts of his description of what he saw are equally exaggerated, his journal does not deserve to be printed. Elaine Goodale contributes charming verses on the Moccasin Flower. The number is agreeably illustrated.

....The English Illustrated Magazine began a new volume last month with a story by B. L. Farjeon, called A Secret Inheritance, and a very agreeable description of Cambridge very atttractively illustrated. The number for the present month continues the story and gives the reader A Glimpse at Bristol and Clifton, which is as handsomely pictured as was the paper on Cambridge. Spanish Facts and English Fancies, by Stanley J. Weyman, is an amusing record of Spanish life. Mr. E. A. Freeman writes again instructively of Some Less Known Towns of Southern Gaul, and his paper is really enriched by engravings of drawings by J. Fulleylove. Old Coventry is capitally presented by pen and pencil.

....The Library Magazine for October.—The reduction in the price of this monthly to one dollar a year makes it by far the cheapest of the periodicals that reproduce foreign literature. It is besides carefully edited, and furnishes, both in the longer articles and in the shorter selections entitled Current Thought, matter which almost any reader would be glad to see.

HESTER, AND OTHER NEW ENGLAND STORIES. By Margaret Sidney. $1.25. "Here are some of the brightest, most natural stories, full of the peculiarities of New England character, and delighting one by their simplicity and naïvete. They are real folks and act and talk as hundreds of New England people do."
THE FULL STATURE OF A MAN. A Life Story. By Julian Warth. $1.25. This book was evidently written with a purpose, and the writer brings out some original ideas on the labor question and other social problems of the day, without in the least interfering with the interest of the story itself, which is wonderfully strong and attractive.
GRAFENBURG PEOPLE: FICTION BUT Fact. By Reuen Thomas. $1.25. There is a quaint, old-time style about this charming story which reminds one of Miss Mitford's writings, and is in refreshing contrast to much of the literature of the day.
A GIRL'S ROOM, BY SOME FRIENDS OF the Girls. $1.00. This volume has been prepared to show girls how to make their rooms pretty and comfortable how to entertain their friends by attractive games, how to make dainty little gifts for friends, and contains many other bits of information equally desirable.
A LEISURELY JOURNEY. BY WILLIAM Leonard Gage. $1.00. Mr. Gage had the advantage of having been abroad several times before, and of thus knowing just where to go and what to look for. His descriptions of the lake country, of Wales, the Isle of Wight, and various resorts in Germany and in Switzerland are full of interest.
SPUN FROM FACT. BY MRS. G. R. Alden (Pansy). $1.50. This is Pansy's latest book, and one of her strongest, and in these days when there is so much interest in psychological literature, will be eagerly read. Dr. Buckley's paper on "Faith Cures," that appeared in the June Century, has called attention to just such cases as are here told.
HOLD UP YOUR HEADS, GIRLS. BY Annie H. Ryder. $1.00. Mrs. Livermore says of this bright little book: "It is from beginning to end a series of wise, sisterly chats with girls, who have had training but not experience. There is not a dull page in it."

From THE CHRISTIAN UNION.
Thank God for this glorious constellation of talent, learning, and piety, combined to elucidate the Word of God for the use of those great masses of the people who are not and cannot be scholars.

From Rev. Prof. W. G. T. SHEDD, D.D.
I have examined the first volume of The Bible Commentary, and find it a superior work. While it would be premature to pronounce a judgment respecting the manner in which the exposition of passages relating to disputed doctrinal points will be made, there can be no doubt that the Commentary, as a whole, will be firmly evangelical and that the whole influence of the work will be to strengthen the reader's confidence in Divine Revelation, and put him in a way to popularize it either in the Sabbath-school or the pulpit.

These books will be sent direct, post or express, free on receipt of price.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

Wedding Bells.

A BRILLIANTLY lighted church, flowers in profusion, banked, wreathed, swinging in a fragrant bell, arched over chancel and garlanding column and rail, a hush of expectation changed to a rustle and stir of interest, moving a great throng, the familiar strains of the wedding march, the beautiful glittering procession through the aisle, and the sympathetic silence as bride and attendants await the fateful moment. The groom is ready. The clergyman begins his service.

Months of preparation have gone before this hour. The maiden, arrayed in the radiant style befitting the occasion, is the pride of her mamma, and the best possible advertisement of an expensive Parisian modiste. In such subdued splendor as his sex and his tailor can compass, the bridegroom matches her, and, if the heart of pater familias is disturbed by apprehensions of future bills, he manages to hide it as he gives the bride away.

Solemn words, solemn ceremony, so quickly over! So sacredly binding! There is a reception, where congratulations fall trippingly from honeyed tongues, presents are displayed, or are mentioned with bated breath, their cost and number catalogued admiringly. The bride goes away in a shower of rice and good wishes, and the curtain falls upon Act No. 1.

The friendly philosopher in the background, observing the pretty pageant, wonders within herself how it will go on, how it will end. The wedding journey over, the two will enter upon the working world. Every-day breakfasts and dinners, every-day worries and cares, pleasures, pastimes, sorrows, temptations, are before them.

They fancy that they will never know a jar in the perfect harmony of their union. But the friendly on-looker could tell them, if she would, that they will find their first married year in many respects more trying than any which can follow it. They still have to learn how to adjust their lives to each other, and dearly as they love one another, it is yet a necessity that they shall learn how to match the ideal with the real. They will be angelic if they succeed in this without occasional friction.

Perhaps the friendly philosopher overheard a sigh, and divined a regret as one of the bright faced gentlemen ushers linked his arm in that of his companion at the close of the festivities.

"Tell you what, old fellow! It costs something to get married!" Was that what the companion said?

"Yes, indeed, and to keep a wife costs, too! I shall remain single!"

The growing extravagance of social life, the amount it takes for woman's dress in these days, the cost of housekeeping and the numberless calls upon the purse undoubtedly deter some young men from marriage. They have their salaries—they know just how far they will go. If they hardly suffice for themselves, with the luxurious habits that are as much necessities to them as the young girl's furbelows and fripperies to her, how would they be able to supply the needs of two. So they flutter about at evening parties, attend on the ladies as escort when concert or lecture makes escort duty pleasant, but take care, as they phrase it, not to get entangled with anyone who has not wealth of her own or in prospect. In plain words, they waste their youth and strength, suffer their hearts to grow cold and cynical because they do not wish to incur any self-denial, while they do true womanhood the disrespect of thinking that it prizes more highly ornament and jewelry than faithful affection and protecting care.

The fact is, that girls do not so greatly desire show and display as they seem to, but, where their parents are established in a certain rank of life, they are trained to regard many little things as part and parcel of existence, which they would readily lay aside if once a strong, noble sentiment of love came into their souls. "Where the true love has once bolted the door, the false love serenades in vain under the window." And the shams of life, the veneering, the mere outside gew-gaws and trinkets are nothing, absolutely nothing, to a sweet, modest, fresh-hearted girl in comparison with her regard for her lover if he have the manliness to speak out and let her know it. The women are few and far between who do not glory in being helps and not hindrances to the men they have chosen as life companions, if they only know fully and freely the circumstances and exigences of the position.

But why, young man, are you limited in your election to women who live like the lilies of the field, and neither toil nor spin. "The world is all before you where to choose." In the same establishment with yourself, perhaps, there are girls—modest, gentle, self-poised—behind the counter quite as well deserving your admiration as those who stand or sit before it. They work for their bread—they help widowed mothers or educate little children, or, from a strong sense of self-respect, they prefer to be workers and not drones in the hive of life, and they would make you, and such as you, wives who would be at every step a help, a stay, an inspiration. Such a woman would be no clog to a rising man.

There are teachers, the peers in intellect and attractiveness of any in the land; there are ladies engaged in various arts and industries, nobly fitted to make home beautiful for a virtuous and generous husband, yet our misanthropic youth, gazing at the splendors of the millionaire's daughter, sighs, and goes on deliberately choosing single blessedness, or unblessedness, lest his means should not allow him "to support a wife."

There is no help so meet for a man in life's conflicts, so true to a man in life's storms, so sweet to a man always, as a fond, faithful, confiding and tender wife. God gave Eve to Adam, and since then every Adam is incomplete, and fails of the greatest glory of his being till he finds his Eve. A shiftless, scolding, incompetent woman is a terrible hindrance to any man, but the man, at least, runs no greater risk in this regard than the woman does. And love, simple, pure, uncalculating love, is a leaven that permeates homely, every-day living with wonderful power. Let me give you my creed about the relations of husbands and wives, as near as I can remember them, in the words of good old Matthew Henry:

"God did not take the woman from man's head to top him, nor from his feet to be trampled on by him, but from his side, to be his equal; from under his arm, that he might protect her, and near his heart, that he might tenderly cherish her."

THE FRIENDLY PHILOSOPHER.

"Give Us This Day Our Daily Bread."

I SPENT a summer in California several years since. I was attracted by the lovely countenance of the minister's wife at the First Presbyterian Church in the city of S——, where I was sojourning—a singular mixture of youth and age. Silvered hair, with a bright, soft complexion that a girl of eighteen might covet. I sought an introduction and was often the guest of the house; a most beautifully disciplined household. Four children, two sons and two daughters; surrounded by everything that wealth, taste and culture could dictate, one would imagine life had been to her as a "summer's dream," but she related an incident of her early married life which touched and interested me. I give it to benefit the skeptical and strengthen the faith of the faithful.

'Twas in the early day, before the completion of any of the inland railroads. Her husband being a politician out of office, with lost fortune, she accepted a school in a mountain neighborhood,—an isolated place—the best she could do then. Soon after a remunerative offer was made her husband to convey some State papers and money to Los Angelos, a most perilous expedition, but he decided to undertake it by stage route. Weeks passed and he did not return, neither had she any tidings from him. The stage passed near her humble home once a week. Hope grew faint, and she feared her husband had been robbed and murdered. Her provisions were almost entirely exhausted; she lived alone with two little children, taking them to the school with her every day—when a driving snowstorm set in, cutting her off from all the neighbors and making it impossible for the stage to come.

She was reduced to the verge of starvation. Poor, miserable, cold, hungry, she begged God to take her life. The house became intolerable with the children's cry for bread; she dragged herself and little ones through the snow to a precipice on the mountain side, praying the good Lord to end their agony and take them all, saying: "Father, take us home," when the thought came to her like an inspiration—'How much easier and more natural for a loving Father to feed His children than to kill them, especially One whose storehouse was ever filled and inexhaustible, who could feed multitudes with a few 'loaves and fishes.'" She could only murmur in a feeble voice, "Give us this day our daily bread," repeating it time and again.

While yet on her knees she could see in the distance the long-expected stage, ploughing its way through the snow, stop at her door and throw off an ample supply of provisions, and she never knew through whose instrumentality God answered her prayer. She accepted it as from Him who gives without money and price to those who trust Him.

Faith has been the beacon star of her life ever since. Soon after her husband returned, and they resolved to devote their days to God's service; he became an eloquent and popular minister, she the beautiful Christian wife and mother.

On my return from a trip to the great Yosemite Valley and big trees, my first inquiry was for this family who had so enlisted my interest, and I was told the lady was dying. I hastened to the home and crept into the room where the Death Angel had already entered. She was surrounded by her family and a few friends. In full possession of all of her faculties, she said, "God would take up the broken threads of life that fell from her hands and place them in stronger, more capable ones." She had a few treasured trinkets to distribute, and to each child she tried therein to convey a dying message from a devoted mother. To her son Ben she bequeathed her watch, asking him to remember 'twas his mother's dying injunction to be prompt—'twas a besetting sin with him to delay—and with every tick of that watch she hoped he would be reminded of her request. Rose had often asked for a pair of elegant bracelets, which she gave to Laura, asking Rose to remember not to covet them, to which vice she was most inclined. To Rose she gave the diamond ring, and to the baby boy, too young to comprehend, she had a chain and golden cross placed around his neck, and begged he might be told it was his mother's wish and prayer that he might bear the cross and become a minister. Then asking her husband to engage in prayer, all knelt at her bedside, and before they arose from their knees the soul of that pure, good woman had winged its flight peacefully to the God who gave it.

They removed to Chicago the following winter, and I lost sight of them until a few weeks since. I learned that every desire of the mother's heart had been fulfilled in those children. The little boy became a minister and gives promise of fame, added to great usefulness and piety.

MERE READING—when the reading-matter is unobjectionable—is no more a good thing in itself than is mere eating when the food is not poisonous. Indeed, the man who reads most is no more likely to gain most, than is the man who eats most. And, as a rule, the greatest readers, like the greatest eaters, are less likely than more abstemious persons to evidence the advantage of their acquisitions. He who reads everything he can lay his hands on, is not the man whose mind is best stored or fullest supplied; a man might as well expect to become an athlete by crowding his stomach with all sorts of food. A man must have a purpose in his reading, and must choose the matter of his reading, and the time of his reading, if he would be the gainer by his reading.—S. S. Times.

Books for Home Reading.

...."LETTERS TO A DAUGHTER." By Helen Ekin Starrett. Those who have the welfare of young girls at heart feel keenly the inability of modern society,—polished as it may be,—to inspire the young to that sense of a behavior which can spring alone from a proper conception of the Golden Rule.

Mothers have been long looking for something in the way of helps which shall comprehend an old-time courtliness, as also the progress of our time. By such, a little book written by one who clearly has a genius for a comprehension of true and delightful manners must be hailed with gratitude. It has none of the lecture-room stiffness about it, but is full of loving confidence; whispering words of wisdom in the ear of the maiden, and fascinating while it convinces. One could not, in selecting a Christmas gift for a girl friend, do better than to choose "Letters to a Daughter." (A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago.)

MARY R. BALDWIN.

Aunt Marjorie has read this little book and adds her testimony to that of Mrs. Baldwin. It is simply delightful, a most satisfying bit of a book, and its exterior is as attractive as its contents. It is to be bought for only fifty cents, and at that price may well be included among the Christmas gifts of those who have daughters.

....For home use perhaps, rather than for home reading, is a beautiful little book entitled "THE BOOK OF ENTREES," by Thomas J. Murrey, whose previous manuals, "Breakfast Dainties," "Fifty Soups," "Fifty Salads," etc., have been real helps to housekeepers. Mr. Murrey's receipts are practical, and his explanations are very clear and minute, while economy is not overlooked in his formulas. (White, Stokes & Allen.)

Speak Kind Words.

OH! speak kind words to one and all,
As through the world you go;
Let helpful deeds beside your path
Like flowers of beauty grow.
The fragrance of a loving word
Will linger in the heart,
As sweetness haunts the flower we prize
When summer days depart.

As we go journeying on through life,
Perhaps we may not know
The good our loving words have done
To those who come and go.
But God will know; and surely He,
In His good time and way,
The giver of each kindly word
Will royally repay.

So speak kind words to one and all.
This life is all too brief
To waste in discord and in strife,
And fill the heart with grief.
With sunshine born of loving words
Let's scatter clouds of pain,
And thus make bright the sorrowing face,
As skies are, after rain.

A Boy King.

BY O. A. BIERSTADT.

IF, by some Oriental enchantment or other, the best of boys could suddenly be made a king, the chances are a thousand to one that he would be utterly spoiled. Louis XIII. might very probably have been a great deal better and happier if fortune had not called him to the throne of France. A slight study of the earliest years of his reign will convince any sensible youth that Shakespeare was right in saying, "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

It was in the fine old palace of Fontainbleau, not far from Paris, that Louis XIII. was born on the 27th of September, 1601. His father was the famous King Henry IV., and his mother's name was Marie de Médicis. These royal parents were quite as superstitious as most people of their time. Being anxious to know what the future had in store for their son, they paid an astrologer a good bit of money to stay up all night and watch the stars when the little prince came into the world, and the astrologer made out a chart, called a horoscope, which was supposed to foretell everything in the boy's life.

Of course, you know, this astrologer was a humbug, and we cannot be sure of what even a day may bring forth. If people could only look ahead, they never would do so many foolish things.

The baby prince was called the dauphin, which title was always taken by the heir to the throne in France, and he had a crowd of servants and people to wait upon him. As a little boy he did not always behave well, and sometimes his father scolded and whipped him severely.

In 1610, when the dauphin was almost nine years old, he suddenly became king. As his father was riding through the streets of Paris in a great coach a wicked assassin stole up and stabbed him through the heart, killing him almost instantly. The news of this sad end made the queen cry and sob dreadfully, but when she exclaimed, "Alas, the king is dead!" a high officer said to her: "You are mistaken, madam, the king does not die in France." He meant that as soon as one king died another took his place, so that the country was never a moment without its king.

The new king was the young Louis XIII., and at first he was more scared than glad. When he sat down to supper, his governor, for the first time, knelt to serve him, as French kings were always served. Little Louis was astonished enough to laugh, then he burst out crying, as he thought how his father had died that very day, and afterwards he said: "I wish my brother was king instead of me; for I am afraid of being killed as my father was." A few nights later the young king dreamed that somebody was trying to kill him, and nothing would comfort him but to be put in his mother's bed. Kings and emperors have only too often been afraid for their lives, and even this boy king felt himself in danger, though he was by no means a coward.

As Louis XIII. was too young to really rule over a great country, his mother acted as regent and attended to all the State business for him. The next day after his father's death, what people called a "bed of justice" was held in the Parliament of Paris. Young Louis was dressed in violet, which was the royal color for mourning, and rode on a white pony to the Parliament. There he made a short speech, which he had learned by heart, but in so low a tone that few could hear him, and then a great officer declared that the king chose his mother for regent. Afterwards, gray-haired men, old enough to be his grandfather, got down on their knees to the boy. But a few days later the little king had to be whipped again because he did not say his prayers, and he begged his governor not to lay it on very hard. When he next went to see his mother, she made him a low bow, as usual, and he said he could do with less ceremony if he did not have to be whipped so much. The life of the youngest of kings is never free from ceremony. Thus Louis XIII. had a great fuss made over him when he was crowned in the cathedral of Rheims in 1610, and when four years later he was declared of age, though only thirteen years old.

It was no fault of this young king if he did not have a very good time. He did not study hard, for his teachers were easy with him. Once he asked a teacher: "If I gave you a bishopric, would you make my lessons shorter?" but the answer was, "No, sire!" Reading he did not care for, because a dry old history had once tired him very much. He liked to handle guns and other weapons, and many of his hours were spent in his little armory, where he thought nothing could be finer than to be a soldier. Most of the time he lived in the immense palace of the Louvre in Paris. Looking out of the windows, he used to see a great many sparrows twittering around. As he could not quite put salt on their tails, he considered it rare sport to let trained falcons and hawks chase after and kill the smaller birds. Boys with such bloody amusements are not likely to grow up into very kind men.

Louis was fond of other kinds of hunting, too. He went out into the country on horseback and shot at birds with his old-fashioned gun, called an arquebuse. Sometimes he took his fiercest falcons on these excursions and set them flying after other birds. Occasionally he started out with a dog after partridges; and now and then he was allowed to chase a stag in the great forests. He was always ready for fun. Battledore and shuttle-cock, tennis, and billiards were among his favorite games. Once he wanted a cock-fight, so he gave his little roosters some wine to make them plucky. Another time he had a little mule brought up to his chamber in the country and fed it with oats. When he first took a long sail on a river he loaded and fired his pistols for salutes, touched off many sky-rockets, and laughed at the crowd of women who waded into the water up to their knees to see the young king. Sometimes he turned ivory pieces on a lathe or applied himself to some light mechanical work, and he did about as well as most boys at drawing, painting, and music.

He had one pet that he was particularly fond of. It was a very pretty little fawn, and he used to run after it all over the extensive gardens of his palace. As he was walking in these same gardens one day with a crowd of noblemen around him, he recognized a country boy named Pierrot, who had in old times been his companion and had caught many sparrows for him. The king rushed away from his fine courtiers to embrace the humble Pierrot, and he wanted the country boy to stay and live in the palace, but poor Pierrot's parents could not spare him from home.

The young king had one curious duty to perform. On specially solemn Sundays hundreds of sick people came to the palace, and the king laid his hands on them one after another, because they were foolish enough to believe that a king's touch would cure them.

When it was decided that Louis XIII. should marry a Spanish princess, a great carousal or tournament was held in Paris during three days. Two thousand people took part in it; they had a thousand horses; and altogether it was better than a circus. Louis XIII. was married to the Princess Anne, of Austria, in 1615, but the marriage was a mere form, and they lived and played afterwards like boys and girls, just as they had done before.

Louis XIII. was a good-looking boy. Usually he wore a hat with a feather in it, somewhat as girls do nowadays. His doublet, knee-breeches, and long stockings were very fine; and he carried a sword at his belt. He was sly, obstinate, and cruel. If he had been less than a king he might have outgrown his cruelty, but it appeared plainly in the act by which he really began to reign for himself.

The queen-mother had a favorite, Marshal d'Ancre. The young king also had a favorite, older than himself, named de Luynes, whose favor had come through his showing the king how to train birds. In time these two favorites began to mistrust one another. De Luynes persuaded the king that the Marshal wanted to keep him a boy forever. The king also had some private grudges against the Marshal, because the latter had put on his hat before him, had once sat down in the royal chair, and such trifles. So the king and de Luynes conspired against the Marshal, and they took a certain captain of the guards into their confidence. On the morning of April 24th, 1617, the Marshal d'Ancre came with a party of his friends on a visit to the palace. Just as he was entering, the captain of the guards met him and said: "The king has commanded me to seize your person."

The Marshal was thunderstruck, but before he could say much five men stepped up and fired their pistols at him. Three bullets struck him and brought him down on his knees. Other men then slashed at him with swords, but the victim was already dead, and the captain assured himself of the fact by stretching him out with a kick. The listening king heard the reports of the pistols, became greatly excited, and called for his carbine and sword. A messenger came at length to tell him that the deed was done. Then the king was lifted up to a window and cried out to his friends below: "Many thanks, many thanks to you; now I am king."

On hearing the news, crowds flocked to the palace to congratulate the king, and he stood on a billiard-table to receive them. After causing a cowardly assassination and sending his mother into exile, this boy king began his real reign, before he was quite sixteen. Louis XIII. was never a happy monarch, and the seeds of his unhappiness were no doubt sown in his boyhood.

Sonnet to the Goddess of Liberty.

BY THE REV. EDWARD J. RUNK, A.M.

FRATERNAL concord of republics strong
United in poetic flame of thought,
And deathless diadem rejoicing sought
To crown their friendship through the ages long.
On granite base secure they wisely placed
A massive Goddess with a hand of flame
Outstretched to greet the world in Freedom's name,
On isle that ceaseless sea and city faced.
With martial throngs and booming cannon's roar,
Pæans and wingéd words from silver lips,
The great men of the nations trod the shore,
Where Liberty salutes the swift-sped ships
In Gallia's name enlighting evermore
Who seeks Columbia, freed from tyrants' whips.

American Bible Society.

THE Board of Managers met at the Bible House on Thursday, Novem ber 4th, 1886. Grants of books were made for distribution in the United States and in foreign lands, to the value of about $5,000; including 1,300 volumes for lumber camps in Minnesota.

Among the communications from foreign countries were letters from Chevallier Dévieux of Port-au-Prince, announcing the organization of the Bible and Religious Book Society of Haiti; the Rev. John P. Dardier, of the Evangelical Society of Geneva; from Dr. Gulick, who was at Hong Kong, September 22d, on his way to Siam; from Mr. Milne, reporting remarkable success in the sale of Scriptures in Peru, and from Mr. Caldwell, of Bogotá, showing how the work begun by Mr. Milne in Colombia is followed up by colporteurs; from Mr. McKim, of Cuba, Mr. Brown of Brazil, and Mr. Hamilton of Mexico, with varying accounts of opposition and success; from Dr. Blodget of Peking, Mr. Blackford of Brazil, Mr. Gulick of Spain, and Mr. Sturges of Micronesia, concerning versions in different tongues; from Mr. Carlson of Helsingfors, Mr. Prince of St. Petersburg, and Mr. Clark of Austria, concerning Bible distribution in various parts of Europe; from Dr. Isaac G. Bliss, reporting a tour in Bulgaria; and from Mr. Arthington of Leeds, respecting opportunities for circulation in South America.

The receipts in October were $30,526.72; issues from the Bible House during the same month, 71,728 volumes.

Total receipts since April 1st, $252,090.76; issues from the Bible House since April 1st, 572,582 volumes.

Call loans varied from 4 to 12 per cent, the average being about 7 per cent. The rate on call yesterday was 6 per cent. The imports of merchandize at this port for the week were valued at $8,400,207, and the exports at $6,700,753 The gold imports for the week amounted to $1,283,794. Foreign exchange sold yesterday at $4 81 1-4 for sixty day bills and $4.85 for demand for sterling. Quotations here yesterday for grain were: Wheat 83 5 8; corn 46; oats 32 3-4. Almost unprecedented heavy rains have fallen in India and the wheat crop there promises to be very large. Prime timothy hay is worth 85 cents, the next grade 70 to 80. Long rye straw is worth 65 to 70. The closing bids for cotton yesterday were: Nov. 8 80; Dec. 8 85; Jan. 8 94; Feb. 9.04. Notwithstanding frequent sales on foreign account the Stock Market continues firm, with few and small concessions. National bank circulation reduced $28,000,000 since August 1st, by redemption of U. S. bonds. Silver dollars worth 78 cents as bullion.

DEATHS.

COLLARD.—At Belleville, N. J., Nov. 2, 1886, in her 73d year, Mary Emily Baldwin, wife of Elder William Collard.

By a consistent Christian life she adorned the doctrine of her Saviour. For nearly fifty-two years of wedded life she fulfilled her marriage vows. Her sphere was her house. True motherhood was her crowning characteristic. "Her children," all of whom have followed her in the faith, "arise up and call her blessed; her husband also and he praiseth her." After years of patient suffering her death was a release from captivity. As we heard her exclamations of confidence, in the presence of death, we could not but think of the words of St. Paul, viz., "Thanks be unto God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." B.

PATTEN.—On Thursday, Oct. 28th, 1886, at Berne, N. Y., Mr. James Patten, in the 91st year of his age.

In the death of this venerable servant of Christ, the Reformed Church of Berne and the community at large lose one of their brighest and most conspicuous characters. Mr. Patten was born at Londonderry, N. H., Nov. 23d, 1795, of an honored New England family. After a course of preparatory instruction in the schools of his native village, he entered Bowdoin College in 1819 and graduated therefrom with honor in 1823. He chose the law as most congenial to his tastes, and having been admitted to the Bar, began the practice of his profession.

In the year 1829 he removed to the village of Berne, where for nearly sixty years he was identified with its most important interests. By his means and influence he contributed largely to the growth and prosperity of the town, and was conspicuous in the numerous improvements which were made within its limits. He served as Justice of the Peace from 1829 to 1833, discharging the duties of this office with signal fidelity, prudence and skill. His counsel was sought in cases which demanded keen foresight and judgment, and his opinion was scarcely ever overruled. In matters of local educational interest he always stood in the line of progress. For a period of eight years he served both as a commissioner and inspector of schools, and had the pleasure of witnessing the advance made in the system of instruction throughout the town.

In the year 1830 he embarked with his brother in the mercantile business in the village of Berne. The character of the firm for uprightness and fair dealing was such that, during a period of twenty-seven years, it commanded the first place in that section of the county, and laid a foundation upon which others have built successfully up to the present time. In 1857 Mr. Patten, having sold out his interest, retired to private life and to the oversight of a farm which he owned in the valley of the Switzkill.

As a Christian he has been a wise, consistent and faithful adherent to the cause of religion. For over a quarter of a century identified with the Reformed Church of Berne, he has contributed much to her growth and prosperity in the character which he has always maintained before the world. He was that type of a Christian which a past generation has produced and which is now being supplanted by one less holy and patriarchal. He was always manly, noble and intelligent, and in his countenance could be seen at once the marks of truth and sincerity. Though quiet and unobtrusive, his counsel was sought in all matters belonging to the peace and welfare of the society, and an opinion from him was regarded as final. His benefactions were many, but so unostentatious that the "left hand did not know what the right hand did." As an elder he ruled well and faithfully; as a husband and father his life was truly an inspiration; as a citizen his character was a tower of strength, and his example a power for good wherever he was known.

Almost to the last his mind was exceptionally clear, and even in the times of the greatest weakness there were occasional flashes of the man within him. He had ability to draw friends to him and to hold them through life, and sincere and widespread is the mourning at his departure.

On Sabbath, Oct. 31st, the last sad rites were performed by his pastor, Rev. Wm. A. Wurts; and on Nov. 1st, amid the tokens of the dying autumn, his remains were gently deposited in the Rural Cemetery at Albany, N. Y., to await the resurrection of the just. And having "served his generation by the will of God, he fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers." R. D.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by David W. Lewis & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.

Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is five per cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ per cent.

Marking-plates furnished when desired.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 26,314 pkgs; exports, 883 pkgs.

The market is steady. Last week's creamery makes are in better demand—special makes selling at 30c. for the extreme top. Fancy fresh private dairy, good enough to compete with the creameries, are wanted at 25a26c. Solid, well made, well kept entire dairies, are in fair demand at 20a23c. If cheesy or sour, or off flavor they sell slowly at much less price, and if extra fine about 1c. higher. We note sales of several lots odds and ends N. Y. State dairy butter, in all kinds of packages, at 12a14c. Finest fresh Western creamery make was in quick demand at 26a29c. and there was considerable enquiry for all kinds fresh make Western butter at full prices. Early makes, ice-house stock, were slow at irregular prices. Market closes with fine fresh butter in light supply and wanted at quotations. We quote:

Fancy fresh creamery	29	30
do dairy (selections)	25	26
N. Y. State dairies entire, good to fine	20	23
do do common to fair	16	18
do creamery firkins	20	23
Western creamery, summer make	15	20
Butter, poor to common	10	15

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 56,565 boxes; exports, 24,578 boxes.

The demand continues good for both export and home trade, and prices are about ½c. lb. higher than last week. Finest colored cheese were quick taken at 12¼a12⅜c., and some sales are reported at 12⅜c. White sold at 12a12⅛a12¼c. Good, useful, early make had considerable enquiry and sold at 10½a11½c.; the fact is, this quality cheese is pretty well sold down, and with light stocks holders are quite firm. Night skims sold at 9a10c., and full skims were in demand at 3a5c. Market closes strong with advancing tendencies. We quote:

Factory, colored, full cream, finest	12¼	12⅜
do white, do do	12	12¼
do good to fine do do	10½	11
do night milk skims	9	10
do skims	2	6

EGGS.—Receipts for the week, 16,679 bbls.

Strictly fresh-laid eggs are scarce and wanted at full prices. Fine marks of limed eggs are selling well. We quote:

Near-by strictly fresh laid, per doz	24	25
Western and Canada, fresh laid, per doz	22	23½
Limed eggs, prime, per doz	17½	18

FOR DYSPEPSIA, INDIGESTION, Depression of Spirits and General Debility, in the various forms; also as a preventive against Fever and Ague, and other Intermittent Fevers, the "Ferro Phosphorated Elixir of Calisaya," made by Caswell, Hazard & Co., New York, and sold by all druggists, is the best tonic; and for patients recovering from Fever or other sickness has no equal.

A Hard Fate

It is indeed to always remain in poverty and obscurity; be enterprising, reader, and avoid this. No matter in what part you are located, you should write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, and receive free full particulars about work that you can do and live at home, at a profit of at least $5 to $25 and upwards daily. Some have earned over $50 in a day. All is new. Capital not required. You are started free. Either sex. All ages. Better not delay.

We are very cautious in recommending anything to our readers, unless absolutely certain that we are on the right side. Practical experience proves that James Pyle's Pearline will do all that he claims for it, and claiming much Pearline is the more valuable. We take pleasure in advising every one not acquainted with this article to get a package at once, and give it a fair trial—for by reducing the toil and drudgery of wash day and house-cleaning it promotes health and happiness, both so desirable.

Only a Step.

When catarrh has progressed to a certain extent, it is only a step to that terribly fatal disease, consumption. If you have catarrh, even slightly, it is a terrible mistake to allow it to continue its course unchecked. If you will only read, you will find conclusive reasons why you should take Hood's Sarsaparilla for catarrh, in the statements of many people who have been completely cured of this disease in its most severe forms. Send for book containing abundant evidence, to C. I. Hood & Co., proprietors of Hood's Sarsaparilla, Lowell, Mass.

An English admiral says: "It is true the life-saving service of America is not equaled anywhere in the world." It is also true that Ayer's Cherry Pectoral saves annually thousands of lives. Invaluable in sudden colds, throat and lung troubles.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is made only by C. I. Hood & Co., Apothecaries, Lowell, Mass. It is prepared with the greatest skill and care, under the direction of the men who originated it. Hence Hood's Sarsaparilla may be depended upon as strictly pure, honest, and reliable.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Absolutely Pure.

Sore Eyes

The eyes are always in sympathy with the body, and afford an excellent index of its condition. When the eyes become weak, and the lids inflamed and sore, it is an evidence that the system has become disordered by Scrofula, for which Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the best known remedy.

Scrofula, which produced a painful inflammation in my eyes, caused me much suffering for a number of years. By the advice of a physician I commenced taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. After using this medicine a short time I was completely

Cured

My eyes are now in a splendid condition, and I am as well and strong as ever.—Mrs. William Gage, Concord, N. H.

For a number of years I was troubled with a humor in my eyes, and was unable to obtain any relief until I commenced using Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This medicine has effected a complete cure, and I believe it to be the best of blood purifiers.—C. E. Upton, Nashua, N. H.

From childhood, and until within a few months, I have been afflicted with Weak and Sore Eyes. I have used for these complaints, with beneficial results, Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and consider it a great blood purifier.—Mrs. C. Phillips, Glover, Vt.

I suffered for a year with inflammation in my left eye. Three ulcers formed on the ball, depriving me of sight, and causing great pain. After trying many other remedies, to no purpose, I was finally induced to use Ayer's Sarsaparilla, and, three bottles of this medicine, have been entirely cured. My sight has been restored, and there is no sign of inflammation, sore, or ulcer in my eye.—Kendal T. Bowen, Sugar Tree Ridge, Ohio.

By Taking

My daughter, ten years old, was afflicted with Scrofulous Sore Eyes. During the last two years she never saw light of any kind. Physicians of the highest standing exerted their skill, but with no permanent success. On the recommendation of a friend I purchased a bottle of Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which my daughter commenced taking. Before she had used the third bottle her sight was restored, and she can now look steadily at a brilliant light without pain. Her cure is complete.—W. E. Sutherland, Evangelist, Shelby City, Ky.

Prepared by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., Lowell, Mass.
Sold by all Druggists. Price $1; six bottles, $5.

I CURE FITS!

When I say cure I do not mean merely to stop them for a time and then have them return again. I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, EPILEPSY or FALLING SICKNESS, a life-long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a Free Bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Post Office. It costs you nothing for a trial, and I will cure you.

BOYS and GIRLS CABINETS. 85 CENTS

Young people are born naturalists. Their first inquiries are in regard to the attractive objects of nature around them; and their future mental activity—or stupidity—depends largely upon the answers they receive.
To aid in this, and to afford abundant entertainment more pleasing than toys; far cheaper and more instructive than mere amusement, I offer for 85cts., delivered free of cost to any home my Juvenile Cabinet, size 8 1-2 by 6 1-2 inches, containing a set of 40 Mineral Specimens. ● The Minerals consist of Gold, Silver, Zinc, Copper, Iron Ores, Topaz, Amazon Stone, Feldspar, Quartz, Cuprite, Iceland and Satin Spars, Cornelian, Selenite, Variscite, Magnetite, Fluorspar, Chalcedony, Petrified and Silicified Woods, and 21 others equally rare and desirable. The specimens are contained in a strong paste-board box, divided into 40 sections (see illustration). A descriptive manual is sent with each Cabinet, giving the history, properties and uses of the different minerals and gems. Trade supplied.

Upon receipt of 85 cts. we will send you this handsome collection, post-paid, same day order is received. Address,

Just for To-Day.

LORD, for to-morrow and its needs
I do not pray;
Keep me, my God, from stain of sin
Just for to-day.

Let me both diligently work
And duly pray;
Let me be kind in word and deed
Just for to-day.

Let me be slow to do my will,
Prompt to obey;
Help me to mortify my flesh
Just for to-day.

Let me no wrong or idle word
Unthinking say;
Set Thou a seal upon my lips
Just for to-day.

Let me in season, Lord, be grave,
In season gay;
Let me be faithful to Thy grace
Just for to-day.

So, for to-morrow and its needs
I do not pray,
But keep me, guide me, love me, Lord,
Just for to-day. —The Baptist Weekly.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Necessary and Unnecessary Work of the Sunday-School Teacher.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

(A Paper read at the Ninth Convention of the Kings County Sunday-School Union, N. Y.)

PART II.

THUS far we have referred to the necessary duties of a competent and faithful teacher. There are other instrumentalities employed in Sunday-school work. How far they may be considered necessary we are not prepared to say. We have reference now to the agencies employed to increase the numerical growth and influence of the school; the picnics, festivals, celebrations and gifts of various kinds. This may be called the temporal side of the work. How efficient such instrumentalities may be as, indirectly, a means of grace, and to what extent they should be employed, it is difficult to determine.

It is constantly asserted that such inducements are required in order to secure a large attendance, and that any ordinary means are justified by which this end may be attained. But is that entirely true? Are we justified in appealing to a child's ignoble feelings and selfishness?

Picnics, festivals and the like, are considered as rewards and encouragements. But this is by no means the sure result, for observe how many children gather in just before some celebration. These do not increase the regular attendance; they come just before, and leave again soon after the occasion. What good can they receive from this exercise of a selfish endeavor to share in pleasure to which they have no right, or to participate in a feast to which they have no claim?

In a plain, prosaic view, the picnic more often results in sore throat and disordered stomach, than in spiritual profit. The free and unrestrained intercourse of so many children tends to quarreling and irritability rather than to a display of Christian graces. Do we exaggerate when we say that the children are apt to reverse at the picnic the principles taught in the school? "Be kind, gentle, forgiving, share with your companions the good things that come to you, do to others as you would have others do to you," says the teacher. How do they put this in practice at the picnic? The roughest of the boys quarrel, and teacher feels vexed at their rudeness. A greedy child grabs for a full share of every dish that is handed him. He takes more than his share, and the modest, retiring child is pushed aside. One boy eats all he can (and what he can eat is marvellous) and another stuffs his pockets, and even his shirt waist, in view of a time when there shall not be so many nice things within his grasp. The little girls remember all their sisters at home and ask for something to take to them, which certainly sounds very affectionate, but you cannot help recalling that they did not think of their sisters until they had fully satisfied their own wants. The play gets to be rough and some of the younger children get hurt; dresses and jackets are torn, and when the hour for returning home comes, they are irritable and tired. They crowd pell mell to get into the vehicles by which they are to return, each one seeking the best seat and quite regardless of anyone's comfort but their own. It is impossible to collect two or three hundred children together for play, and in unrestrained freedom, without such results. I appeal to the experience of the teachers to know if this statement is overdrawn. If not, do these things improve the children? If they do not, what possible excuse is there for considering the picnic an agency in Sunday-school work? What right have we to lay the burden of the picnic upon the teacher unless it has a tendency to enforce instead of reversing the instruction received on the Sabbath? What claim has the picnic to be considered part of the Sunday-school teacher's work? Can we plead that the scholars have a grateful appreciation of the money given, the time spent, and the pains taken to make the picnic, or the celebration, whatever it may be, a success? Have they been more attentive, more desirous to learn? Have they gratefully expressed their thanks to their teachers? On the contrary, they have taken all that you have done for them as a matter of course, as something to which they had a right, and Sunday-school teachers have aided and abetted the children in this rudeness by never asking of them anything better! Would it be polite in ordinary life for a child to accept a favor without saying "thank you?" I cannot see why Christian kindness should not demand at least equal courtesy! Why should Sunday-school scholars accept everything greedily, and take everything kindly done for them, as if they had a right to it, simply because they are Sunday-school scholars? Surely rudeness and ingratitude should be everywhere discouraged, and to find these traits not even frowned upon in Sunday school celebrations is a strange perversion of things and leads to strange results.

"I will attend this school, not that school," says the candid but mercenary little one. Why? because the one selected is nearest? most easy of access? Because the parents attend that church, or believe in the doctrines taught there? No, but because the school designated offers the highest bid for the child's preference, and we must not blame the child for its worldly view when the bribe (in the shape of entertainments) is offered by Sunday-school teachers.

If, then, this whole system of celebrations has so little spiritual result, why is it continued? Simply because it has become so general. Because one school does it, another must follow the example, seeing that the size of a school is taken as the measure of its success. These appeals to the lower nature have become so general, and form so much a part of Sunday-school work, that that school will do a brave work indeed which breaks through this custom and demands only of the overburdened teacher the spiritual instruction of the children. We fear that this will not be until the nearer approach of the millenial season, when love to God and good will to men will rule the world and children will be taught to attend school that they may learn of Christ, and not that they may have fun at a picnic. But, even now, let teachers have a care lest in their very desire to do good to their scholars and to please and gratify them, they may not be tampering with their highest interests and cultivating, instead of repressing, that mercenary spirit which is so unlike the teaching of Christ.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

Nov. 21st.—"Walking in the Light."—1 John 1: 5-10; 2: 1-6.

Golden Text.—"If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 JOHN 1: 7.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—MATT. 5: 16.

INTRODUCTION.

THE epistles of John were the fruit of his old age, and express his ripe convictions of truth, confirmed by his long experience of their power to sustain and comfort him. The first epistle is without address, and has been regarded as intended for all believers. Its theme has been well stated by Dr. Macdonald as Christian Fellowship in its twofold aspect; the union of the believer with God and His Son, and the union with one another.

THE LESSON.

I. CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP —VS. 5-7.

V. 5.—"This is the message which we have heard from him" John's teachings, like those of the other Apostles, come to us with direct Divine authority. Even Paul's Gospel was received by revelation of Jesus Christ. This direct message was also fully attested by the personal experience of the Apostles, as John so forcibly states in the opening of this epistle. "God is light." We are indebted to John for three condensed descriptions of God, which excel all others in conveying an idea of His nature. "God is a Spirit;" "God is light;" "God is love." "In him is no darkness at all." A luminous body may cause shadows to appear where its light is interrupted, but it can have no shadows of its own. God makes our imperfections manifest by contrast, but there is no imperfection in Him.

V. 6.—"If we say that we have fellowship with him." Alas, how much of the religion of men consists in saying so,—in confession with the mouth without belief in the heart. "And walk in darkness, we lie" The Apostle uses strong language, but the subject demands it. A body cannot be in the light and in the dark at the same time; so a man cannot be in living union with God, and at the same time show only the proofs of an unregenerate nature.

V. 7.—"If we walk in the light, as he is in the light." In proportion as a soul has drawn near to God, it will think as He thinks and choose as He chooses. We can walk in light only as we walk in God's light. "We have fellowship one with another." There is a subtle but strong bond that unites all true followers of God. In proportion to our fellowship with Him will be our fellowship with each other. "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." Our fellowship does not depend upon our walk, but is manifest by it; both the walk in the light and the fellowship with God depend upon the grace manifested in the shedding of the bood of Jesus.

II. SIN.—VS 8-10.

V. 8.—"If we say that we have no sin." This refers to the persistent sinfulness of human nature. In itself always and everywhere sinful, until it shall have passed beyond the realm of temptation. To say that we have no sin is to deny our need of a Saviour. "We deceive ourselves" We certainly do not deceive our fellow men, who laugh at our assumed innocence, and we can much less hope to deceive God to whom all secrets are open.

V. 9.—"If we confess our sins." The plural here is significant. Confession is not to stop at an acknowledgement of abstract unworthiness, but we must search ourselves, and recognize our specific transgressions, and confess these with true repentance. "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." Forgiveness of the sinner is both gracious and just in view of the atoning blood of Christ. "And to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." Without this promise of cleansing the gift of pardon would be in vain. The work of Christ will be completed only when we stand complete in Him.

V. 10.—"If we say that we have not sinned." That we have no need for repentance, pardon, and cleansing. "We make him a liar." All the various revelations of God tell one story of human sin and guilt. The soul that wraps itself up in self-righteous neglect of Christ gives the lie to Sinai and Calvary.

III OBEDIENCE.—2: 1-6.

V. 1.—"These things write I unto you that ye sin not." Or, as in the Revision, "that ye may not sin." It is necessary that we should comprehend both the mercy of God and our own constant peril from sin. Only by recognizing our constant weakness shall we seek for constant supplies of grace. "And if any man sin." Recognizing the weakness of human hearts, even when the love of Christ dwells in them, and the persistency and force of the temptations that assail the Christian in this life, John sees that the followers of Jesus will often come short of their ideal and of God's requirements. He would not leave such to despair, but points to the source of help. "We have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous.' As Peter after his fall could confess his Saviour and protest his love, "Thou knowest that I love thee," so we, conscious of weakness and sin, can cling closely to our Advocate, knowing that He who hath begun a good work in us will perfect that which concerneth us. "He is the propitiation of our sins." The atoning sacrifice, prefigured by the procession of victims that had been offered upon the altar of the Lord in Old Testament times. "For the whole world." The Gospel is for all the world; the grace of Christ is needed by all and sufficient for all and offered to all.

V. 3.—"Hereby know we that we know him, if we keep his commandments." This is but a repetition of Christ's own words, "If ye love Me, keep My commandments." Know is often used in the Scriptures as equivalent to love. To know Christ aright is to love Him, and love delights in obedience, mourns especially over its disobedience. Love as a motive endures forever. It is the motive of heaven.

V. 4.—"He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar." It seems so absurd that that one could claim to have a saving knowledge of Christ who was not zealously striving to please Him, that the emphasis of the Apostle appears uncalled for, yet human nature is always ready to abuse Divine grace, and the Antinomian spirit is more general than we think.

V. 5.—"Whoso keepeth his Word." John is not satisfied with negative statements. He passes from condemnation to approval. The keeping of the words of Jesus is the essence of the Christian life. "In him verily is the love of God perfected." Faith worketh by love, and love fulfils the law. In proportion as we keep the words of Jesus do we experience God's love, and show an answering love for Him. "Hereby know we that we are in him." A simple test of our renewal is here given us. "By their fruits shall ye know them."

V. 6—"He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk even as he walked." The life of Jesus has as much to do with our salvation as His death. He not only fulfilled all righteousness Himself, but by His life of purity, obedience, and sacrifice He gave us a chart whereby to direct our course through similar conditions of temptation and service.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

Tests of Christian Experience.

1. Fellowship with God.
2. Walking in the light.
3. Confession of sins.
4. Resting in the assurance of pardon.
5. Obedience to Christ's commands.
6. Cherishing the words of Christ.
7. Imitating Christ in daily life.

This is My Commandment that Ye Love One Another.

THIS text has many lessons in it. Let us try and learn one which, I think, was beautifully taught us a little while ago by a poor boy who lived in the East end of London. Harry, for many weary months, was unable to run about like other little boys, because his hip was diseased. Often his tender mother would put him in a chair just outside the door of his house, that he might get as much fresh air as came into that narrow street, and when the sun was shining be cheered by the brightness. Harry would sit there for hours, his little crutch beside him, in case he felt tired and wished to go indoors again. The passers-by were mostly too busy to take any notice of Harry; sometimes one would turn round, attracted by the little invalid's sorrowful face, and say, "Poor little boy!" and put a penny into his hand, for which Harry would feel very grateful; but any pleasure which the penny brought would soon pass away, and leave the longing, "Oh! to be able to run about like other boys." One day—oh! how well Harry remembered it, it was a day of days in his life—some kind lady brought his mother a letter for a children's hospital, and Harry was told that he was to be taken there on the morrow, perhaps to be made quite well.

I cannot stop to tell you all about Harry's stay in the hospital; how he grew to love the doctors and the nurses; how he learned to sing the beautiful hymns, and love the picture scrap books and toys; best of all, how he managed in time to walk without his crutch, and then—yes, actually to run half way down the ward.

When Harry left the hospital he was very, very glad to get home again, but oh so sorry to leave all his kind friends. The thought that made going a little easier was to think that some other little suffering boy might come to his bed and be made well; for Harry had learned while in the hospital to love all little boys who had pain, even if he did not know them really, and in his love he longed that he might help to make them better. I think these beautiful and loving thoughts had come to Harry as whispers in his heart from the Lord Jesus Himself, who seemed always to be there in the ward, there in the hymns which they sung, there in the gentle, tender lives of the nurses, there in the bright and compassionate visits of the ladies who came to it.

I think Harry must have been thinking of the "dear hospital ward" one morning, when he was coming home from school, where he was now able to go regularly. Suddenly he paused before an open door; just outside, in a perambulator, sat a little boy about his own age—two crutches propped up beside him. Perhaps if Harry had never himself suffered, he would have passed this little boy quite carelessly, but that was impossible now; then he went nearer, and there was a real tear in his eye as he said:

"Poor little chap!"

The next minute he had lost his shyness, and putting his arm on his shoulder he said:

"Don't cry;" for the boy's lip was trembling and tears seemed very near. "I was ill like you once, and I had to sit still all day; but now I can run about, and I'm ever so strong!"

Then as a happy thought seized Harry, he said excitedly:

"I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll wheel you, just as you are, right off to my hospital and ask them to make you well, as they did me."

At this moment the sick boy's mother came out to hear what was being said, and Harry was so warm in telling her about the cure to his own hip, that after a little while he coaxed her to let him take her boy Percy, just as he was, to the hospital. "It would not take them many minutes to get there"

Just picture Harry wheeling that perambulator. Away they went, up one long street and down a short one, across the road very, very carefully, and they were there.

Harry ran up the steps and tugged at the bell. The hall porter smiled as he saw Harry's flushed face; he looked very tenderly upon him when he said:

"Please, I've brought a little boy to be cured. I want to see the doctor."

That was how little Percy became a patient in Harry's hospital. I do not think he got so well as Harry had done; but he was much better when he left, two or three months later.

Now, what is our lesson? To love the Lord Jesus is to love and care for and live for others. If we have a joy we will pass it on.

Yes! dear children, all true life means "passing on" to others that which the God of love has given to us.—Mrs. G. S. Reaney, in Sunday Magazine.

A Soldier's Statement.

FLEMINGTON, N. J., Oct. 31, 1885.

DRS. STARKEY & PALEN,

Dear Sirs:

I am sorry you felt it needful to ask "permission" to do a thing so obviously right, and a thing that I am myself doing at every favorable opportunity, viz:—state for the benefit of other sufferers, what Compound Oxygen has done for me.

You certainly and most cheerfully have my unqualified permission to use any information concerning my case that you have, or that I can give you, though I suppose you have about all there is.

What it did for me is so remarkable that it is with diffidence I tell the whole truth, except where I am well known.

You remember the cause of my trouble is, that during the war, at the Battle of Fredericksburg, a minnie ball went crashing through my spine lengthwise, passing, the surgeons said, as close to the spinal chord as it could and not sever it. Inflammation was only prevented by constant applications of ice at Washington for a month afterwards. By spells since, and sometimes for about a year together, the suffering amounted to extreme agony, so great that insanity it seems must have been the result had I not been quieted with morphine before I got the Compound Oxygen. The last "pull" I had (and I had them at intervals of about two years) ended with the use of Compound Oxygen, in the summer of 1882.

The day the Compound Oxygen came I was not able to sit up to have my bed made, so sat up in bed to inhale and thought as I did so, "sold again, this will amount to nothing."

However, determined to follow directions, I inhaled again in the evening, and instead of six doses of morphine that evening, as on the last evening before, I only took one small dose, and slept more than usual, and better. The next night took no morphine and slept good eight hours, and in less than two weeks walked (on crutches) a quarter of a mile at a time.

Like most of all who get up feeling "so good," but whose judgment is as feeble as the body, I would overdo, and get down, but I would get up almost as soon These downs and ups covered a space of perhaps three months, since which time I have not been confined to the bed nor house for a day, but of course an injury so great is a permanent one; of such a nature is the injury that at times (more likely after a spell of writing) any person standing close to me when I turn my head slowly can hear a grating sound similar to that produced by rubbing a knife on a whetsone. Of course such a mangling and tearing of the nerves centering (do they not?) along the spine, leaves me in a constantly enfeebled condition, but when the brain feels strained and the nerves sensitive, a few days' use of the Compound Oxygen brings back (has every time so far) an increase of vitality, and all the health that can be put into a body that has been so harshly handled and much more than you Doctors encouraged me to hope for when I asked your advice concerning it. I regard Compound Oxygen as nature's strong right hand for repairing bodily waste and damage.

Yours truly, REV. J. C. SUNDERLIN.

FLEMINGTON, N. J., Sept. 20, 1886.

Dear Sirs:—I remain comparatively comfortable. The "house I live in" is shattered and torn, and as it is impossible to tear the whole house down, I have to do the next best thing, viz: to "strengthen that which remains" as well as I can, and my resort has constantly been, since the first remarkable experience with it, to Compound Oxygen.

In the use of this auxiliary of nature there is no remarkable shock of any kind given to the system.

I am now satisfied more than ever that the ABSENCE of such a shock or thrill to the system is just precisely what should be.

Nature in all her normal and healthful operations works silently and quietly, and if measured by the moment, or perhaps even by the day or week, would be found almost imperceptible in her progress.

If we had not been sustained all our lives by breathing the atmosphere which surrounds us, who would believe in the seeming nonsense of breathing? It seems a mere nothing that we inhale and exhale fifteen or twenty times a minute, and yet we are dependent upon it for life. We could not endure its privation for five minutes, and yet that atmosphere can be so contaminated, and without arresting the attention of one of the senses, that it would not support life for twelve hours.

Such are the subtle influences which should be thought of by those who have an idea that this remedy (Compound Oxygen) is not efficient simply because it is tasteless.

How foolish (?) to swallow down the tasteless draughts of limpid spring water, but how long could life be sustained without that tasteless beverage?

The glorious light of heaven comes to us in a quiet way, yet who can compute the actual uplifting power of the sunlight for one day in our hemisphere? The tons and tons of water and other material, in the form of grains, grasses and fruits, actually lifted up from the earth by the quiet influence of the sun? Just such are the silent influences, though mighty forces, which are daily busy building up our physical structure, the mysterious temple which is so beautifully adapted for our dwelling place here a little while.

In connection with such thoughts I can easily apprehend, though I may not fully comprehend, any more than I can how the light accomplishes all its wonders, how this beautiful but potent vitalizer of the human body should so efficiently do its work.

It might be interesting to me to know (though not more useful) HOW the Compound Oxygen brings me a quiet restful feeling that induces sleep, and puts nature in a condition where all her forces can be employed repairing damages; but though I may not know how the sunlight silently lifts, and colors, and improves all nature, may not know how the silent forces of attraction hold all things in their places, may not understand all the laws controlling the subtle operations of vitalization, and so not know how this sweet vitalizer and restorer of nature (Compound Oxygen) does its work, it is sufficient for me to know it does.

There must be the same patient, restful waiting for this that there must be for the natural growth of anything else, and then there will be the same rejoicing in the blessed realization of healthful happiness.

I am still as well as could be expected, taking the Compound Oxygen when the wheels of life show signs of friction, and need to run easier. But when, after an interval without it, I begin to take it, I generally sleep a little better the first or second night, and it is not like sleep induced by narcotics. Without it I have reason to believe I should not now be alive.

Yours truly, J. C. SUNDERLIN.

To learn "what Compound Oxygen is—its mode of action and results," send your address to Drs. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa., and you will receive free by mail a work of two hundred pages, giving an interesting statement in regard to this simple remedy, with a large number of cases of cures by its use.

Catarrh Cured

Catarrh is a very prevalent disease, with distressing and offensive symptoms. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives ready relief and speedy cure, from the fact it acts through the blood, and thus reaches every part of the system.

"I suffered with catarrh fifteen years. Took Hood's Sarsaparilla and I am not troubled any with catarrh, and my general health is much better." I. W. LILLIS, Postal Clerk Chicago & St. Louis Railroad.

"I suffered with catarrh 6 or 8 years; tried many wonderful cures, inhalers, etc., spending nearly one hundred dollars without benefit. I tried Hood's Sarsaparilla, and was greatly improved." M. A. ABBEY, Worcester, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

VOL. LVII.—NO. 46. WHOLE NO. 2938. | NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1886. | $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. NO. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

THERE are about five millions of Christians connected with the evangelical Protestant churches of this country. Their influence is great. How much more powerful would it be if every one should be a faithful steward of the manifold grace of God and were striving heartily after a higher and holier life and to win other souls back to God through the Lord Jesus Christ!

SLANDER.—We find various opinions in the secular press on the propriety of President Cleveland's reference in his address at the Harvard commemoration to the "mean and cowardly lies" by which men in public station are assailed in the newspapers. We agree with those who regret the reference, because it will do no good, but rather gratify the inventors or retailers of despicable calumnies. The best answer to all such scribblers is contemptuous silence, especially on the part of those who hold conspicuous positions. He who is conscious of doing right as he sees the right can afford to pass unnoticed anonymous charges, however gross or false. The people at large will soon learn where the truth lies, and a calumniated official may leave it to them to do the right thing in the end. Meanwhile, it is not wise to show that the poisoned arrows have hit the mark.

THE CHURCHES are frequently accused of neglecting the ignorant, superstitious, vicious masses of the large cities. The accusation is without foundation, for nearly every city church has its mission chapel, mission Sabbath-school, industrial school and society to assist and befriend the poor. But it must not be overlooked that the Christian churches of the United States have maintained a home missionary work, in establishing churches along a constantly advancing frontier in the West, which has never been equalled. It has demanded the labor of hundreds of men and the expenditure of millions of dollars. If there had not been such a work to be done the men and the money could have been devoted to city evangelization. The largest achievement of Christianity has been the extension of the Church of Christ over this vast country, and it has been accomplished within less than fifty years. In due time the same energy and Christian liberality will be devoted to work in the cities, and will attain results no less magnificent and desirable.

A SORE BEREAVEMENT.—Not often is so large a portion of the American Church afflicted by a single death as was the case last week when the press announced that Archibald Alexander Hodge was no more. Our departed friend was so widely known as an able divine, a thoroughly trained theologian, a staunch defender of the faith once given to the saints, that very many besides those of the Presbyterian fold deeply bewailed his loss. Taken so suddenly, as he was, in the prime of his mental vigor, and when he and such as he are so greatly needed, not a few found it hard to acquiesce at once in the will of Providence. How much precious and blessed work in behalf of the common faith was justly to be expected from him, and yet he has gone, and we shall no more see his face in the flesh. The only consolation is that God loves His Church far better than any of us does, and that He, having seen fit to remove this lamp that burned and shined, is abundantly able to supply its place with others yet more brilliant. Still, devout men will feel and act like those who buried the first Christian martyr, and, we are told, "made great lamentation over him."

THE REV. DR. R. S. STORRS preached two notable sermons last Sabbath in Brooklyn, in commemoration of the fortieth anniversary of his settlement as pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims. The congregations, both in the morning and evening, were very large. The sermon of the morning, after describing the character of the Pilgrim Church and the extent of its usefulness, reviewed with great ability the conflict of theological opinion in and around the Christian Church during the past forty years and the results. The discourse abounded in memorable passages. The review exhibited the futility of the many attacks which have been made upon the facts and doctrines of the Scriptures and upon the faith of evangelical Protestants. The evening sermon was devoted to a Christian view of the important changes which have occurred in Brooklyn, in the United States and in the world during nearly half a century. Quotations will be given in these columns hereafter. To-morrow evening a reception is to be held by Dr. and Mrs. Storrs at their residence, where Brooklyn will be represented by its chief men and women as it seldom is.

Dr. Storrs has attracted and held together one of the most intellectual congregations of the United States, and his power with his people and among the citizens of Brooklyn was never greater than it is to-day. His services to the city have been of inestimable value. The Historical Society, the schools and academies, the public and denominational charities, the hospitals, the City Missionary Society, and nearly every institution to promote the public weal, are indebted to him for services in public addresses and private recommendations and advocacy which cannot be repaid. To probably no other citizen does Brooklyn owe so much in the acquisition of such institutions as we have named. As one of her prominent citizens said a few years ago, "When Dr. Storrs says that this or that should be done, we cannot refuse our aid." He has also been a strong fortress in the defence of evangelical belief, and a most intelligent, wise and invincible leader in the conflict with error and in the declaration of the Word of Life among all men.

The Name of God.

IT is an interesting fact that one of the results of scientific research is to establish the scientific accuracy of the chief Scriptural names of God. In the International Sabbath-School Lesson, interpreted on the fourteenth page this week, the following passages occur: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, (the I am,) which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty," and "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last." Early in the beginnings of revelation God declared Himself through Moses to Israel, as the "I AM, THAT I AM," or the independent, self-existent, infinite and eternal one, the source of all life.

To change from these sublime words to the language of science and the processes discovered by it is at first somewhat shocking, but when the testimony of science is fairly apprehended, testimony brought from the immensity of the visible universe, the words of Scripture are clothed with additional and overwhelming significance.

The admission and assertion by the great body of scientific men of the existence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things have proceeded and by which all are sustained and controlled, has been frequently presented in these columns. The physicists, whose calculations are claimed to be more exact and conclusive than those of any other class of scientific explorers and reasoners, insist upon the existence of this Energy before and in and always in all other objects. This Energy they hold has no limitations of time or space. By the law of the transformation of force they trace the presence and work of this Energy through the characteristics of non-living objects. Those who deal with living forms maintain that vital force in all its manifestations emanates from the same Eternal Energy. It is, therefore, scientifically correct to describe God as the "I Am," "Alpha," "the first," "the beginning," "the Almighty." But it is also held by the large majority of scientists that the present visible universe is going on to an end, that it is growing old and must at some time reach the end of its years. How, then, will it die? Scientifically, by the reversion of the process which has thus far continued. The transformations of Energy will be turned back, to proceed back on the course on which they have advanced and return into the Infinite and Eternal Energy from which they were evolved.

Motion, for example, is transformed constantly into heat, light and electricity, and these again are constantly transformed back again into simple motion or the energy manifested in motion. In the electric dynamo mechanical energy or motion is converted into a mighty tide of electric energy, and by the comparatively slight resistance of the carbon points and the effort to pass from point to point, or by the resistance of a carbonized thread of matter, this electric current is converted to a considerable extent into light and heat, and these again become invisible and imperceptible to our senses as they are transformed into waves of simple motion. So there is nightly before the eyes of many of us a brilliant illustration of the universal law of the conservation and transformation of energy.

Let, then, the process by which the universe has become what it is be reversed, as it is in accordance with science, or certainly not contrary to science, to maintain it will be, and everything returns into the original Infinite and Eternal Energy. God, therefore, is the Omega, the last, the end, the Almighty, the I AM.

There is, moreover, nothing contrary to science in the Scriptural declaration that this reversion shall be into and through a consuming heat,—that the elements shall melt with fervent heat, that the earth and all it contains shall be burned up,—for the various manifestations of energy are constantly transformed into heat.

The "I am," "Alpha and Omega," "the first and the last," "the beginning and the end," "the Almighty," are accurate scientific names and definitions of the Infinite, Eternal, Omniscient, Holy and Omnipotent God who has declared Himself to us in His Word. That in a remote age the results of scientific research were so anticipated and recorded in terms so clear, so full of impressive majesty, is to us, and reasonably, we think, proof that the Scriptures were inspired by God in mercy to men.

Thus far the processes of creation and development have been in close accordance with Revelation and afford a firm basis for the belief that in the periods to come and in the life which shall succeed that which now is, there will be the same concurrence with the declarations of Holy Writ.

A FAILURE.—In a review of Prof. Sidgwick's "Outlines of the History of Ethics," it is said in Nature, the chief representative of Evolution and the philosophy based upon it:

From the earliest times of Greek thought the foremost philosophic minds of Europe have restlessly sought for sanctions of the moral code; and the last quarter of the nineteenth century sees but little unanimity of opinion on the subject. The purely intuitional moralist dreads, in the determinist ethics of evolution and of utilitarianism, the death blow of virtue properly so-called. The followers of Bentham and of Spencer foresee the downthrow of morality unless some sanction more solid than the intuitionalist can supply be found for the ethical creed, unless "morality be established on a scientific basis." Neither can bring himself to understand how the creed of the other can really influence conduct; and both believe in their inmost hearts that the conduct of the other is really determined by something that goes deeper than the outward profession of faith.

By "profession of faith" the reviewer does not mean a religious profession, but a profession of belief in a certain theory or system of morals. He writes about men who for themselves reject a religious faith, while they allow that it is useful among those less enlightened and philosophic.

But there are two points in the paragraph worthy especially of attention. One is that the professed philosophers who have been making moral systems, independent of, apart from, and usually rejecting, Christianity as a superstition, find that their moral codes have no efficient sanction, or, in other words, that they are without motives strong enough to induce obedience—are unable to make men moral. The motives presented it is not necessary to enumerate. It is only our purpose to mention that they are not derived in any degree from the Scriptures. One party sees that if its rival be accepted as the teacher of morals, "the death blow of virtue" will be inflicted. The other "sees the downthrow of morality" unless the system it antagonizes more or less can furnish stronger sanctions than it has presented. They are both right. Neither of these, and indeed none of the godless and Christless systems of morals, will restrain or remove human depravity. They are failing to-day just where Pagan systems failed. Confucianism also fails, not because it does not teach a pure and lofty morality, but because it has no sanctions strong enough to induce obedience. The confession of failure through lack of sanctions is, however, the point to which we would give emphasis without argument. The other point is that each one believes that "the conduct of the other is really determined by something that goes deeper" than the moral system he advocates. Of course it is. They are living in Christian countries or in countries where the Bible has great moral power, and, although they reject the Scriptures and Christian faith, their conduct is really determined by a belief in the Bible and the sanctions it presents. Although they deny it in their writings they are restrained from sin and incited to righteousness by the fear of the God of Holy Writ.

"Old Colony" Papers.

THE OLD AND THE NEW....FATHERS AND SONS.... AN INTERESTING ORDINATION....A VETERAN OF CHRIST....A GLIMPSE OF HARVARD'S BI (AND A HALF)-CENTENNIAL.

ONE of the greatest gains of my Seminary course at New Brunswick was the acquaintance and friendship of Ezra W. Collier. He was six years older than myself, and had seen more of the world than most theological students. He had also a rich literary culture, and was one of the most brilliant and fascinating talkers I ever knew,—that is, when he was in the mood of talking. He seemed always in the mood when we were together, which was during a large part of our spare time. We took our "constitutionals" together every afternoon, generally on what was then the usual students' promenade, the railroad track. Our fellowship was as affectionate as it was congenial, and when after a brief ministry he succumbed to the long inroads of physical weakness there was an eclipse of much which had made life brighter to me, as well as of "a light in the world holding forth the word of life."

Well, a generation has passed since those old seminary days, and last week it was my gratifying task to assist in the ordination of his son and only child. It was one of the most inspiring and satisfactory occasions of my life. I felt glad to do something in remembrance of him of whom my chief associations were as a youth like this one, on the threshold of the ministry. And as he stood there, he looked singularly like his father, with the cheering exception of an apparently much more vigorous physique. It seemed as if he were stepping forward to take up the work which that father was called to lay down before yet it was noon.

This is always a peculiarly interesting event, as full of tenderness as of significance. The Church has no "apostolical succession" except that of the spirit, but it can boast many a line of hereditary succession, levitical families, signs and seals of God's covenant with His faithful servants and households of faith. Our Church rolls are especially emblazoned with these saintly pedigrees; and a young man seems twice-called and doubly ordained who thus stands up to take his father's place, and perhaps (as in this case on his mother's side) to continue the testimony of a long line of Christian pastors. And one must be very unimaginative if not unbelieving, who should not be conscious on such an occasion of the invisible presence and benediction of a rejoicing spirit, to whom the "Even so, Father" of an early surrender of his life-work is changed into a hallelujah. It must be one of the hardest trials of a Christian's faith to leave his little ones in this world of evil and uncertainty. But it must be a corresponding triumph of faith to see them when developed into the stature of a Christian manhood taking upon them the vow of a still completer consecration, and, in far off imitation of the Divine Father when He sent his only-begotten into the world, to be able to say, "This is my son in whom I am well pleased."

The ordination of Mr. George Zabriskie Collier at Stuyvesant was rendered still more interesting and significant from several other facts. One was the participation of two of his uncles, the brothers respectively of his father and his mother, and clergymen of our Reformed Church, in the service. Another was the presence and charge to the new pastor by the venerable and beloved Dr. Wm. H. Campbell, whose relations to Mr. Collier have been peculiarly those of a father in Christ, and to whom the latter has been able to make some return by efficient coöperation in the establishment of the little church to which the ex-President has devoted his vigorous and mellow age.

And still another was the retirement of the Rev. Elbert Nevius after a faithful and godly pastorate of forty years. During my ministry at Coxsackie, and afterwards in the Hudson River Ministerial Association, I used to see a good deal of this excellent and devoted man, and I do not think any one could know him but to love him. He has always struck me as a model of Christian simplicity and godly sincerity,—withal having a young heart in his bosom, and a bright, shrewd and manly way of expressing himself. His ministerial associates "up the Hudson" will ever remember him as one of the most paternal and yet boyish of men, with an amiability which had no vapidness in it, a cheeriness in cloud and sunshine, and entertaining qualities as a conversationist which never marred our veneration for his wisdom and piety. All hearts went out towards him on this occasion, realizing the solemnity of the hour to one who felt that it pronounced the "amen" of his life-work, and especially sympathizing with him in the sudden call from his side of her whose energy and love had done so much to sustain and hearten him during all these years. May his young successor be found as faithful in his Lord's service, and merit as thoroughly the epithet, "A man greatly beloved."

From Stuyvesant I passed on to Cambridge. During my visit occurred the celebration of Harvard's 250th Anniversary,—one of the most important and imposing events in the history of American education. It enlisted the united zeal of undergraduates, alumni and faculty. It was felt to be a glorification of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts itself, and an alluring occasion for a renewed burning of incense before the shrines of the Pilgrim Fathers. Unless it be the South Carolina University, no college has ever so represented, shaped, and dominated a State as Harvard has.

It was certainly a shining illustration of what the pilgrims of Massachusetts Bay were, that they had hardly staked out Boston before they must have their Cambridge. So in six years they had voted a munificent sum for "a schoale or colledge," which seems however to have been a Micawber "note of hand" till, two years after, the Rev. John Harvard was so public-spirited as to die and leave seven or eight hundred pounds, with his library, to the inchoate institution. It was a timely gift, and illustrates the saying that "he gives twice who gives promptly." It has sometimes been spoken of with a sneer that Elihu Yale's 500 pounds, and John Harvard's fifteen hundred, and Henry Rutgers's one thousand, should have secured the naming of those colleges after them with its resultant immortality of fame. But it must not be forgotten that these gifts came just at the time when the very existence of those institutions depended on it, and the hundreds which they gave then were more essential than hundreds of thousands would be to-day.

Let us not forget, too, as the Harvard of to-day would have us forget, that the special stimulus to this high enterprise was to provide a training school for ministers of the Gospel, and that to the founders of Harvard college sound learning was identical with sound theology. This is evidenced by the known intentions and declarations of the founders, by the fact that the first chair to be endowed was a professorship of divinity, and by the motto of the college, "Christus et Ecclesia." It is sadly to be regretted that the heavenly skylight has more and more shut down on this ancient institution, and the uncertain side-lights of a mere world-knowledge have been regarded as the sole avenues of truth.

This celebration has far more than a local interest, or even the significance attaching to the founding of our oldest and most national college. It commemorates the inauguration of the higher education in our country, and I regret that the general tone of the proceedings has been so provincial and has failed to rise to the height and breadth of this idea. Harvard was sixty-five years old when Yale was founded, and antedates Princeton by 110 years, Columbia by 119, and Rutgers by 134. It meant the recognition of the fact that this new world is dedicated to the love and pursuit of knowledge. It must not be concealed, as the Harvard of to-day assiduously conceals it, that the special knowledge which the founders had in view was that of God; nor that, while John Harvard "builded better than he knew" when he left his little library and half his estate for "a schoale," he builded worse than he hoped in the thoroughly secularist, and to a considerable extent agnostic, tone of its later teachings.

The most striking features of the celebration have been the following, which my space will only permit me to barely mention. One was the presence of President Cleveland, the sixth President who is known to have been received here, the others being Washington, Monroe, Jackson, Hayes and Grant. Mr. Cleveland, as usual, took the Lord's Day for his travel. Cambridge University of England was represented by two distinguished scholars, Dr. Creighton, the Church historian, and Dr. Taylor, the Semitic scholar. The former is Master of Immanuel College, of which John Harvard was a graduate. The colleges of New England, and some of the older colleges in other parts of this country, were represented by their Presidents. Sir Lyon Playfair represented the University of Edinburgh. A number of these gentlemen I had the honor of meeting at various receptions given by the ever hospitable Cantabrigensians.

There was an overwhelming attendance of graduates, at least two thousand having registered their names by Saturday. The pressure for tickets was so great and the accommodations so limited, that it was an enviable fortune even for the "elect" to gain admission to the principal exercises. It was a deeply interesting sight to observe the long line of alumni, as they filed in to the Monday morning meeting in the order of their classes. Several of the oldest graduates were there, and a tottering and decrepit group they were. The line showed many famous persons, but also a striking number of seedy, and even some rather disreputable looking ones. Harvard was generous of its degrees, flinging around a profusion of them to the representatives of other colleges, and not overlooking the President of that important institution, the United States—which latter degree was, however, with characteristic modesty declined.

The undergraduates' celebration on Saturday was greatly marred by the weather. The boat races were rowed in a fog, the foot-ball game was played in the mud, and the torchlight procession was postponed till Monday. This was, however, on the latter evening the most unique and picturesque part of the whole celebration. The classes were arrayed in old time costume, there were various scenic and historical representations on wheels, and the town was gorgeous with lanterns, torches, and decorations. The literary exercises of the students were quite creditable, and their music, vocal and instrumental, during the whole celebration unusually fine. Phillips Brooks's sermon, a glorification of the gospel of "broadness," was a disappointment. He seemed to consider that Harvard's whole history, the religious inclusive, had been a great success, and a development in the right direction. The whole tone of the speaking throughout has been a pæan of praise for the degree in which Harvard has been untrue to the intention of its founders, or an ingenious attempt to apologize for it. Mr. Lowell's oration was in all respects worthy of the occasion. Dr. Holmes inflicted a poem of forty-five minutes, and of course gave his usual spiteful "digs" at orthodox religion. The speaking at the dinner was brilliant and notable, though dreadfully protracted.

What will Harvard be at its next quarter-millenial? There must have been some very uncomfortable ghosts hovering about this one!

The American Board and the Andover Theology.

THE note in which Mr. Alpheus Hardy resigns for the second time from the Prudential Committee of the American Board and the comment of the Rev. Dr. Mark Hopkins, the venerable President of the Board, form so important a phase of the contention between the Board and the advocates of the theology which Andover has imported from Germany, that we print the documents in full from the Congregationalist of the 4th. Mr. Hardy is a Boston merchant of the highest standing and a gentleman of ardent piety. He is noted for his charities. In fact, he is one of Boston's foremost citizens, and at that centre of Unitarianism has maintained evangelical Christianity. For many years he has been the Chairman of the Prudential Committee. He is to be regarded as one of the most stanch, earnest, and generous supporters of the Board. Nothing less than the most decided convictions could lead him to the action he has taken.

These are the documents:

Boston, October 18th.

To the President and Corporate Members of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; Brethren: I fully appreciate the honor you have conferred upon me in declining to accept my resignation, and in re-electing me upon the Prudential Committee.

I believe there has been during the past few years a divergence in the practical management of one part of the Board's work, which has, to some extent, brought the Board from its broad, catholic, "undenominational" and charitable position, to be a partisan in questions that are not within its province, are local, in a measure personal, and divisive. With such a policy I cannot agree, and, believing it to be detrimental to the best interest of the Board, must decline to be a member of a body upholding it, viz., the Prudential Committee.

I remain, with respect, now and ever your colaborer in the work to which every follower of Christ is commissioned. Alpheus Hardy.

To the Editor of the Congregationalist: A communication addressed to "The President and Corporate Members of the American Board" has been sent me by Mr. Hardy. In a letter accompanying it he says, "I see no way to reach the corporate members but through the press, and you may select that channel." Accordingly, I send a copy of the communication to you, with the request that you will give it a place in your paper.

In connection with the above, I ask space for some remarks respecting the present difficulties of the Board, fearing that many of its constituents may misplace and over-estimate them. Those difficulties all arise from the fact that the theological fitness of candidates for missionary service is determined by the Board through its Prudential Committee. For a long time this has been successfully done, and the Board has secured, through its Committee acting thus, the three objects indispensable to its success. It has sent out suitable missionaries; has selected those missionaries in such a manner as to retain the confidence and full coöperation of its constituents; and it has preserved, in a good degree, harmony in the missions. Let these three things be done, and methods are relatively unimportant.

Of late, however, there has been dissatisfaction, perhaps deeper and more widespread than the Committee have been aware of. This has come from the attitude, or supposed attitude, of the Committee towards certain theological questions and theological seminaries; from its action in filling its own vacancies, done, nominally indeed, by the Board, but really, and almost necessarily, by the Committee; and especially, not from its standard of doctrine, but from its mode of dealing with individual candidates for missionary work. There has also been a serious division of opinion in the Committee itself. Now, as was said above, this dissatisfaction with the Committee at each of these points, well grounded or not, and this division in the Committee, was possible only from the fact that it has rested with the home secretary and the Committee to decide on the theological fitness of candidates for missionary work. If the members of the Committee had been chosen, as, but for this, they would have been, with no regard to their theological bias, but solely with reference to their interest in missions, to their financial skill, to their ability to judge of men aside from their theological fitness, and to decide wisely the various and often complicated questions that come up in the management of the missions, not a lisp of recent or present difficulties would have been heard. There would have been no division in the Committee, and no difference of opinion between the foreign and home secretary.

The question then arises whether a different mode of deciding on theological fitness is not desirable and demanded. The present mode does not belong to the Board by charter, and is not a necessary incident to its work. It is not in harmony with the statement in the Manual of the Committee, that "the Board is not an ecclesiastical body," nor with the resolution of 1871, that "neither the Board nor the Prudential Committee are in any wise a theological court to settle theological points of belief;" and certainly it is not in harmony with the Congregational, or any other ecclesiastical polity. It need not, therefore, be retained, if a substitute can be found.

It was suggested at Des Moines that such a substitute might be found in a council properly appointed and guarded. I believe it may be. There is now, with many, a distrust of councils. If they are packed, I agree with them; but that need not be. Councils are liable to mistakes, and so are prudential committees. Nothing here is perfect. But I believe that when missionary candidates seek ordination, arrangements may be made for councils that will test them fairly, and give us as good a body of missionaries as can be had in any other way. If not, the Congregational polity is not fairly adequate to the prosecution of missionary work, and ought not to exist. For myself, I should be content with a council of the viciuage. Others may not be so content. Special arrangements, perhaps a representation from the Board, may be needed, and Dr. Dexter says that the system is flexible. Such a solution would relieve the Board from a permanent point of attack, and I commend it to the constituency of the Board for full discussion. Meanwhile, it is to be hoped that the Committee will not share the tendency, very apparent in some quarters, to minimize the import of the unanimous vote of the Board at Des Moines, but will candidly and cordially give us their aid in solving this question.

In the above it is supposed that the applicant is a Congregationalist. If not, credentials from a Presbytery or other evangelical body should be accepted. It is, indeed, to be presumed that no other course would now be tolerated, whatever former usage may have been.

These remarks I venture to make in connection with the very serious aspect of our difficulties presented by this declinature of one who has been so munificent and conspicuous in missionary work, and who has so long acted as the honored Chairman of the Prudential Committee. I venture to make them, that our constituency may see that the difficulties are not radical, and need not be chronic. A single slight change in our mode of working might, and I trust would, restore essential harmony. They will be wisely cared for by the Committee, and it would be monstrous if the streams of our beneficence should dwindle, and their efficiency be impaired by difficulties springing from a single point like this. Especially would it be monstrous if, as has been spoken of, there should be any division of a great denomination on such a point.

The charter of our Board is broad. Under it missionaries of different denominations have been sent out, and may be—as many of them as can work together in harmony. Except by accident, the Board is not denominational. Its object is not to make Congregationalists, but Christians, and then leave its converts to frame such a polity as they may think best. In this it differs, as I suppose, from all other Boards in this country. For this we are thankful, and rejoice in the opportunity of doing something for the Master that shall not have that reference to self which is involved in building up our denomination. Let us, then, enter upon the work with increased zeal, and at the end of the year, if God shall spare us, let us, as we have hitherto done, gather in force to hold up before the world that one grand idea which has given its special interest to our meetings—the ultimate and complete triumph of the Son of God. Yours etc., Mark Hopkins.

A Great Enterprise.

THE Christian Literature Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., have just issued the first volume of "A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church," translated into English with Prolegomena and Explanatory Notes, under the editorial supervision of the Rev. Philip Schaff, D.D., LL.D. Among the numerous American translators and editors are the Rev. Drs. T. W. Chambers, of this city; C. D. Hartranft and M. B. Riddle, of Hartford; Bishop A. C. Coxe and G. F. Seymour, and other well-known men. The list of European helpers embraces some of the most celebrated patristic scholars of the age.

From the prospectus of this great undertaking we learn that it is a continuation of the previous series of "The Ante-Nicene Fathers," published by the same company, and edited by Bishop Coxe; that many of the works appearing will be translated into English for the first time; that they will be given in full, with notes and introductions, and that it will embrace two series of thirteen tall octavo volumes, each containing from five hundred to seven hundred pages; that the first series will consist of the works of Augustin and Chrysostom; and the second those of the later Fathers, the whole list extending from A.D. 325 to A.D. 900. As the object is entirely historical, without any sectarian or partisan aim, the English reader will now be possessed of "the chief sources of the faith, practice, worship and discipline of the Greek and Latin churches, down to the time of their separation."

Four volumes will be published annually until the work is completed. The subscription price is put at the low price of three dollars per volume, and no order will be received for less than the thirteen volumes of each series. When it is considered that Migne's Greek Patrology, in the original, numbers 167 quarto volumes, and his Latin Patrology 222 volumes, and that, by omitting the immense patristic commentaries on the Old Testament, the patrons of these series will obtain the most valuable works of the most eminent of the Latin and Greek Church Fathers, it will be seen that this is a rare opportunity for enriching one's library at the small cost of one dollar per month during the period of its publication.

The first volume of the Nicene Fathers contains the Confessions of Augustin, with 269 of his Letters, preceded by Dr. Schaff's ample Prolegomena, which embrace a sketch of the literature of the works of this greatest of the Latin Fathers, a brief biography, and three chapters containing an estimate of his character, writings and influence upon posterity, and his relation to Catholicism and Protestantism.

The translations of the entire series are to be based upon the best critical editions of the originals. In some cases, surviving authors of older translations have accepted invitations to revise and edit their work for the American series. And there is good reason to expect the fulfilment of the American editor's promise that this collection "will be more complete and more systematic, as well as much cheaper than any which has yet appeared in the English language."

It is unnecessary to write more of the importance, value and timeliness of this large and costly enterprise, especially to students of church history and theologians, and to ministers of all denominations who desire ready access to the ecclesiastical sources of the faith and life of the Eastern and Western churches of Christendom. The best endorsement we can give is the statement of the facts which may stimulate many to secure the long-hidden treasures which are now brought to their doors in this convenient, elegant and very cheap form.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

A New Chapel.

THE Prospect Hill Reformed Church, New York city, has in process of construction a building that promises much for the future. Over a year ago a favorable site was secured on the corner of Park avenue and 89th street, and here, leaving the corner intact for the erection of a church building at some later date, a chapel, to cost about $20,000 and to be finished by April 1st, 1887, will be built. The structure, which will be 30 feet by 95 feet in size, is somewhat comprehensive in its plan; it will have in the basement a kitchen, furnace rooms, etc.; on the first floor a Sabbath-school room; on the second floor a chapel, ladies' parlor and pastor's study; on the third floor, with a private hall leading from the street to it, a commodious parsonage containing eleven rooms. The architect is Mr. S. B. Reed, of 245 Broadway, who has had large experience in the erection of churches, and who guarantees in this instance a building most suitable and convenient.

Our Foreign Missions.

THE condition of the treasury from which the foreign missions of the Church draw their support is such as to call for immediate relief. The ability of the Board to borrow upon the collateral security it holds is exhausted. The appropriations for the present year are $82,000. The outlay for six months is, therefore, $41,000. The receipts for the six months, extending from May 1st to Oct 31st, were $17,530, making it necessary to borrow, in round numbers, $23,000. During the present month, the receipts continuing inadequate, an additional sum has been borrowed, making the obligations of the year $27,000.

Last year the receipts during the same months were $17,883. There has been a decline this year of about $300. Until the middle of August the income of the treasury was larger than in the corresponding part of 1885. Since then, however, there has been a falling off. The year, it will be remembered, was begun with a debt of $10,500, which is to be added to that of the present year.

It is encouraging, however, to know that the liabilities of the Board are not as large as they were at this time a year ago; but the existing need of prompt relief is evident.

Less than $18,000, as the sum of the contributions of 81,000 Christians, to say nothing of the non-professing attendants upon our services who are interested in and give for the support of our missions, is certainly no fair measure of their ability during the past six months to maintain such a work as our Lord has entrusted to us in foreign lands. A glance shows that it is less than twenty-five cents a member. Neither is it a fair measure of the disposition of the Church. Surely, the record cannot be corrected too soon, and we have confidence that it is only necessary to present the facts in order to ensure a decided change.

TREASURER.

Rev. John Forsyth, D.D., LL.D.

THE Board of Foreign Missions at the regular meeting of November 10th, adopted the following minute:

The Board laments the death of the Rev. Dr. John Forsyth, but rejoices in the recollection of his long life, so full of evidences of the power of Divine grace and of the faithfulness of our God in the fulfilment of His promises,—a life that strengthens our Christian confidence and encourages our hope.

For a period longer than the average duration of human life Dr. Forsyth had been eminently useful in positions demanding the exercise of widely different qualities and attainments. He was an accomplished teacher and Professor, an impressive preacher, an especially acceptable contributor to journals and periodicals, a learned author, and was as well a man of affairs, wise in counsel and practical in action, being a leader in the organization and administration of the system of public schools in the city in which he was born and lived and died, a valuable member of the Board of Trustees of a savings bank, and an active participant in official positions in many of the enterprises instituted by his fellow citizens for the promotion of public interests.

But we especially remember with thankfulness his life-long hearty interest in the work of preaching the Gospel to every creature, and the many years in which we have enjoyed a delightful fellowship with him as a member of this Board, and received from him a generous support in the maintenance of the special work entrusted to our care. In his youth, when a student, Dr. Forsyth profited by the lectures of Dr. Thomas Chalmers in the theological school at Edinburgh and attended the famous monthly meetings in the interest of foreign missions, conducted by that eminent Christian, and which gave a mighty impulse, felt to this day, in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland, to the resolution to win the world to Christ. Dr. Forsyth imbibed the enthusiasm then awakened among the students and pastors and many of the church members of Edinburgh, and, as the years advanced, those early impressions became a settled conviction and resolute purpose. We count it to-day to have been an unusual privilege to have been brought into fellowship with such a spirit and to have enjoyed its inspiring and sustaining influence.

We cannot conclude this minute without recording the pleasure we have enjoyed in social and friendly intercourse with a most genial, courteous and sympathetic Christian gentleman, and the profit received as he drew freely upon the rich stores of knowledge his scholarly habits had acquired and upon the conclusions of experience, educed from a large acquaintance with men of all classes and with a wide range of active life.

....ULSTER CLASSIS ITEMS.—The call of the Church of Flatbush is declined by the Rev. C. I. Shepard, who recognizes the importance of the field, but for various reasons cannot at present undertake it....The people of Woodstock speak of the Rev. Wm. A. Wurts, who has just gone to Berne, as perhaps the best preacher they have ever had....The Rev. Wm. Schmitz, Jr., was installed pastor of the Church of Roxbury, Delaware Co., on Wednesday, Nov. 1st. The Rev. Denis Wortman, D.D., presided and preached the sermon; the Rev. B. C. Lippincott charged the pastor. The congregation are cordially united, and have a beautiful church in the prettiest village along the Ulster & Delaware Railroad.

....THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION met at 34 Vesey street Monday morning, Nov. 15th, and listened to a thoughtful paper by the Rev. A. G. Vermilye, D.D., on "Paul's View of the Woman Question; or, The Place of Woman in the Social Church Meetings." The paper elicited a general discussion, and the author's views, in favor of women being heard at such meetings, were endorsed. Next Monday a paper is to be presented by the Rev. Dr. W. J. R. Taylor on "Practical Ecclesiastical Safeguards of Christian Doctrine."

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Rev. L. Dykstra, of North Orange, Iowa, has accepted the call from the Holland Church of Albany, N. Y....The First Church of Grand Haven, Mich., has called the Rev. H. E. Nies, of Paterson, N. J....Vriesland, Mich., has called Rev. H. Van der Ploeg, of Fulton, Ill....Rev. John Smit, of Wortendyke, N. J., goes to the Third Church of Pella, Iowa....Rev. J. F. Zwemer was installed Nov. 7th as pastor of the church at Alton, Iowa. His father, Rev. A. Zwemer, of Free Grace Church, Iowa, preached the sermon and read the form; Rev. F. J. Zwemer, of Charles Mix Co., Dak., conducted the devotional services; Rev. H. K. Boer, of Maurice, Iowa, gave the charge to the pastor, and Rev. A. Buurema, of Orange City, Iowa, to the people. In the afternoon, to a crowded house, the new pastor preached his inaugural sermon from 2 Cor. 5: 18, "And all things are of God, who hath reconciled us to Himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation." Thus the only Protestant church in a railroad town of about one thousand inhabitants, made vacant by the removal of Rev. J. W. Warnshuis to Passaic, N. J., is again supplied with the preaching of the Gospel of reconciliation.

....THE SCHENECTADY COUNTY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION held its second annual convention in Schenectady, N. Y., on Friday of last week. The Rev. N. F. Nickerson, of Glenville, N. Y., presided, who, at the business session in the afternoon, presented an interesting report of the good work accomplished by the Society since its organization. The Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, of Albany, spoke on "A Call to Teach," and the Rev. P. E. Kipp, on "The Responsibility of the Teacher." The topic, "The Young in Relation to Church Work," was discussed by the Rev. James Paxton and Mr. D. J. De Camp. The Rev. Eugene Booth, of Yokohama, Japan, also made an address. The Rev. Lauren V n Derveer was elected President for the ensuing year.

Rev. E. W. Bentley, D.D.

EDITORS OF CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER: I am sitting this evening under the shadow of a great sorrow. Its pungency is more sharp because so many days have gone by since the death of my friend, Rev. Dr. E. W. Bentley, without my knowledge of it, and also because of the envelope lying before me, addressed to him and awaiting my moment of leisure to reply to his last letter. It seems incredible that he has been at rest so long, and that I shall never again receive from his pen such words of good cheer, brave counsel, and utter loyalty, as have characterized our acquaintance for almost twenty years.

Upon my becoming a member of the Classis of Orange, his hand seemed to give the warmest grasp of all that noble body of brethren. A friendship at once inaugurated and enduring so long, without any lessening of mutual interest, found us often together, whether in the graver duties of our calling or in the more social phases of recreation. He was the same truly unselfish, manly, courageous friend, in each relation. I cannot question but some other pen will furnish the tribute his faithful life of a quarter-century at Ellenville deserves; but mine may hint the sense of loss, which would only be too selfish did it clamor for any recall of what a loving Providence has done for the weary, but patient sufferer.

I cherish the testimonies which have come to me from his experiences of disappointment and weariness, as equal to any ever read. They were written both to encourage and to testify. It was the full-souled Christian refusing to doubt, though walking amid many clouds and great darkness; but walking, not refusing to follow his Master!

The last letter he wrote me contains one or two utterances which may warrant his friends to hope that his last months, though accompanied by a physical inability that would have discouraged almost any man, may have left matter which would gratify many friends. He says, with his well-known pleasantry of style: "I am tugging along as well as I ever expect to do. I write a great deal. Am writing up reminiscences of my life in Ellenville, for my boys. They can do what they please with them when I am gone. I have given a history of my going there, a sketch of the church, the village as I found it, of the town of Wawarsing, of its Indian warfare, of my rides here and there, of the Classis, of the Synod, of my horses, of the new parsonage, of the academy, of my choir and choristers, of Domines Williamson, Scott and yourself, of my weddings, funerals and Thanksgivings, of the War and the doings in connection with it, etc., etc., etc. It is rambling, and probably nobody will care to read it at all. I follow my note-books which I have kept from year to year; I may as well write as do nothing. It keeps me from thinking and worrying, and serves a purpose."

Referring to his greatly restricted life he says, "I go to church on the Sabbath generally. We have a good minister, who preaches capital sermons. His last Sabbath sermon on "No man liveth to himself," was very able, very convincing ...His name is Alvord."

The last words of this precious letter are as follows. They seem now to have been written from a standpoint whence he saw the "Goodly Land," into whose breadth of safety he has now so surely entered. "Please don't think that I am tired of living. I am not. I am ready and willing to wait God's time. It is a trial to me to be so worthless, so useless; to feel that I am in the way and should be out of it. It is one of the enigmas of God's Providence that I cannot solve, and I try to let it alone. He knows best and will do what is best; and with that I am content. Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him."

We may not question that the sustaining grace of the Master whose leadings he was so earnestly following, was the abundant solace of the faithful servant. What the developments of the new life have already revealed to our brother we may not yet know; but that the freed soul has entered upon nobler activities of service than are allotted here, and the more abundant heritage of reward, who can doubt?

JOHN H. FRAZEE.

RIVERTON, N. J., November 9th, 1886.

....At an extra session of the CLASSES OF PARAMUS the pastoral relation between the Rev. John Smit and the Holland Church of Wortendyke was dissolved, and he was dismissed to the Classis of Iowa, within whose bounds he has received a call.

S. C.

....NYACK, N. Y.—By unanimous agreement the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist Churches of Nyack were closed on Sunday evening, November 7th, to enable their pastors and people to greet the Rev. J. C. Van Deventer in his new charge. The Reformed Church became so crowded before the time of service that many who desired to attend were unable to gain admission. The opening prayer was offered by the Rev. J. L. Campbell, (Baptist) and the closing prayer by the Rev. C. S. Woodruff, (Methodist). The Rev. J. E. Lloyd (Presbyterian) assisted in the services, as did also Revs. J. L. Zabaiskie and C. R. Blauvelt; so the meeting was in every respect a union one, in which a warm spirit of fraternity was shown. The Rev. Mr. Van Deventer preached from the text, John 17: 4, "I have glorified thee on the earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do." He presented the Gospel truths in a clear, simple and interesting manner, and the impression made upon the large audience was very favorable.

....Obituary.—The Rev. Peter J. Quick died at New Brunswick, N. J., Tuesday, Nov. 9th, eighty years of age. He received his education at New Brunswick, graduating from Rutgers College in 1833, and from the Theological Seminary three years later. The next year, 1837, he settled at Clarkstown, N. Y., where he continued the pastor for nearly 30 years. He was for five years rector of Hertzog Hall, and from 1874 to the time of his death, librarian of Sage Library.

Mr. Quick was highly respected for his uniform consistency; his fidelity to truth, and his readiness for every good word and work. Those who knew him for fifty years retain the same high opinion of his unblemished character which they cherished at the outset of his life. He was of the older class of our ministers, and did honor to the training which he received when Milledoler, Cannon, and Ludlow adorned our Seminary.

....Schenectady, N. Y.—The First Church has presented a call to Rev. Mr. Sewell, of Williamstown, Mass.

The Rev. A. A. Hodge, D.D.

THE Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander Hodge died last Thursday night at Princeton, N.J., from a cold which resulted in a complication of disorders. His death was sudden and startling. He was born at Princeton on July 18, 1823, and was the son of the eminent theologian, Dr. Charles Hodge. He graduated at Princeton in 1841, and was a tutor in the college from 1844 to 1846. In 1847 he graduated from the Theological Seminary, and proceeded in a few months as a missionary to Allahabad, India, remaining there until 1850, when his wife's health made a return to this country necessary. Between 1851 and 1879 he was pastor successively of the churches of Lower West Nottingham, Md.; Fredericksburg, Va.; Wilkesbarre, Penn., and Allegheny City, Penn. The General Assembly elected him Professor of didactic, historical and polemic theology in the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., in 1864, and in 1879 made him professor of theology at Princeton, a position he filled with marked ability to the last week of his life. He edited the Princeton Review at one time, published "Outlines of Theology" in 1860, "The Atonement" in 1867, a "Commentary on the Confession of Faith" and "Presbyterian Doctrine Briefly Stated" in 1869. He was an eloquent and vigorous preacher, and delivered a sermon of great ability in the College chapel the Sabbath before his death. His social qualities were unusually attractive, and he was greatly beloved by a large circle of friends.

The General Outlook.

....The Presbytery of New York has begun a Gospel service on Sabbath evenings in the large hall of Cooper Union, to be continued through the winter and perhaps permanently. From half-past seven to eight o'clock is devoted to a service of song, conducted by a leader of experience in such an exercise, assisted by a large choir. After this an evangelistic service of one hour occurs, consisting of prayer, reading of the Scriptures, addresses and singing. The service is mainly for the sake of bringing the large non church-going population of that section of the city under the influence of the Word of God. The prayers of Christians are requested in behalf of the endeavor, and their co-operation in striving to induce the irreligious to attend.

....The missionary year of the Methodist Episcopal Church closed on Oct. 31st. The "million for missions" was almost secured. The amount received during the twelve months was $992,128.47—only $7,871.53 short of the million. Legacies yielded $133,958 21, and the collections $836,592 37. Legacies showed an increase for the year of $32,056.38, and gifts an increase of $142,557.42. The increase over 1884 is $261,002.61. The Eastern Conferences contributed $663,945.60, and the Western $328,182.87. For the first time in ten years the Missionary Society is out of debt, and has a balance in the treasury of $50,834. When these facts were announced at the annual meeting the doxology was sung "after the good old Wesleyan fashion, 'lustily.'" The motto adopted for 1887 is "A Million for Missions, From Collections Only."

....The debts of the late Archbishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, will probably be paid in part. The Tablet says that at the recent synod of arch-diocese, attended by 170 priests, the Archbishop Elder brought forward the debt question. The clergymen expressed their willingness to coöperate with his plans. A commission was appointed to consider a plan with reference to the best way of raising the funds and the best mode of distributing them. The commission held its first meeting on Oct. 25th. Archbishop Elder offered $1,000 as his contribution for this year, to head the list of subscriptions, and said that he would continue to contribute through subsequent years. He said that he had been obliged to go into debt to the extent of $4,000 to purchase the various articles of the late archbishop that his episcopal position required, such as cross, crozier, etc. A number of the priests offered to pay from $50 to $250 yearly for five years, and several also engaged to endeavor to raise $1,000 a year amongst their congregations.

....The Rev. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, England, has written to Canon Mathie: "At the close of seven years of my episcopate, I am desirous of building a church as a thankoffering to God for the many and great blessings which I have received at His hands since I came to Durham, and your parish (Hendon, Sunderland) has naturally occurred to me as the fittest locality. It is by far the most populous parish of the diocese, while at the same time, being inhabited chiefly by workingmen, it could not be expected to contribute very largely to such an object from its own resources. As soon, therefore, as a suitable site is procured and other preliminaries are arrranged, I am prepared to hand over to the Diocesan Church Building Fund, or (in the event of my death) to give directions to my executors to pay over a sum for the erection of such a church. I trust that this will be only the initiation of a general effort to increase the amount of church accommodation in Sunderland Our existing churches have generally large, and in some cases overflowing congregations. We have, therefore, every encouragement to go forward, and the honorable example of some Nonconformist bodies may well stimulate us to fresh exertions."

....A tablet to the memory of General McClellan has been erected in St. Cloud Presbyterian Church of West Orange, N. J., bearing this inscription:

GEORGE BRINTON MCCLELLAN,
Major-General U. S. A.,
Governor of New Jersey.
Elder of this Church.

"I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith."

Around the outer edge of the tablet is a border of laurel, and on the upper part are the symbols of his rank in the Army, the two stars and the commander's baton. The device is on heavy rolled brass, set against a background of black marble. It was designed and executed by Messrs. J. & R. Lamb, of New York.

....The charges against the Andover Professors, as presented in a definite form, have been accepted by the Board of Visitors and served on the accused.

....Mr. Moody commenced a series of meetings at Cambridge, Mass., on Monday evening. He faced 1,200 men, largely Harvard students, who received him with respect, but without enthusiasm. The result will be watched with interest.

....The Hospital Sunday collections this year in London have yielded $200,000; the largest amount ever obtained.

A Thanksgiving Souvenir.

THE Rev. Alfred H. Fahnestock has prepared a dainty and beautiful Thanksgiving album, as it may be called, of eight or ten pages. It contains selections of Scriptures and an appropriate ode to be sung to Auld Lang Syne,—the musical score being handsomely printed on one page. Three pages are blank for autographs. The cover is decorated in gold and colors; the American flag being selected as the symbol of an American feast. On the blank pages the members of the circle present at a family dinner, or the choice friends uniting in the annual festival can write their names, and the little book become a cherished souvenir of the occasion. Hard & Parsons are the publishers, and have performed their part with excellent taste.

Martyrs of Holland.

BY REV. DANIEL VAN PELT.

IV. John Pistorius, of Woerden—His Death.

THE Hague, the city where the King of Holland holds his court and where the Parliament meets, aspires to be the most elegant city of the kingdom. And certainly the most beautiful and delightful part of the city is that where the "Vyver" is situated. This is a large pond whose silvery waters on the one side reflect the Parliament houses, rising directly from their surface, while on two other sides it is bordered by quays adorned with flower beds and shaded by rows of noble trees. Beyond the trees are seen the splendid palaces of some of the richest and most aristocratic citizens. If we leave the court whereupon the Parliament buildings face, and proceed along the adjoining or "outer" court to the head of the "Vyver," or if we approach the latter along the tree-lined quay or street opposite the Parliament, we shall in both cases come upon a grim old building in a shady quadrangle, to which the sun has no access, and where his cheer would evidently be of no avail. This is the Gevangen Poort, or "Prison-Gate." Dire scenes have here been witnessed at various periods of Dutch history. And here John Pistorius was confined in the early part of the year 1525.

This building has long since been abandoned as a prison, the last person who was confined here being now a very aged man, once high in the employ of the State, (we are assured by the guide), who was brought to this unfortunate pass by a youthful indiscretion while at the university. The interior, therefore, is now open to the inspection of the public. We had not expected to find the actual prison or cell where Pistorius was confined. No guide-books had made mention of it, no history that we had read had specified its exact location in the Hague. It was accordingly with a feeling of strange excitement that we followed the guide when he proposed to show the very spot where John Pistorius had spent several dreary months. Up to the third story he took us, along a winding staircase with solid oaken steps. Then we were conducted through a narrow corridor, on one side of which were arranged cells that had much the appearance of cages or stalls for cattle. On the side of the door, and from a distance of about four feet above the floor to the ceiling, they were provided with a network of powerful iron bars, crossing each other at right angles and leaving spaces perhaps four inches square. Thus the passer-by could have a full view of the interior, the light coming through windows high up in the opposite wall of the corridor. Such was the cell of John Pistorius. It was located at the further end of the corridor, the part of the hall upon which it opened being itself shut off from the remainder by a stout oaken door. We passed through this doorway and then through the cell-door into the cell. It was almost totally dark. The guide lighted a candle and showed us a hole broken through the brick wall, but closed by an impenetrable partition of solid oak against which the bricks rested. He said that Pistorius had dug the hole with his fingers. Holding the light up to the plastering he pointed to figures and words drawn and written in blood, and alleged that the martyr in his despair had traced these there. He called our attention to the fact that three sets of grating in the window before us, cut through a wall eighty-four inches thick, and the grating of the cell itself, prevented the prisoner's escape in that direction; and bade us count the six successive, immensely thick oaken doors that shut him out from liberty.

The sight of the very surroundings which had brought direst misery to this historic character so long ago was deeply impressive. But it was especially important to us because now we could clearly understand a circumstance of which mention is made in every account of this martyrdom which we have read, namely, that on his way to the stake Pistorius, passing the prison, addressed words of comfort to his brethren in the faith there confined, and was answered by exhortations to firmness and songs of praise. It always seemed inexplicable to us that prisoners should have been confined in a manner so convenient for exchanging conversations with passers-by in the street. But it now seemed very plain. In the cell next to Pistorius, on the same corridor, were confined six or more persons eminent for learning or character, and also on the charge of favoring the heretical doctrines. On being led to execution he must necessarily have passed by this cell, and the open grating already described gave abundant opportunities for the interchange of greetings such as are recorded in the various histories.

In this dark, dismal cell, then, Pistorius languished for several months. He was not even permitted to remain there alone during all this period. At one time he was compelled to share it with ten of the vilest and lowest criminals, swarming with disgusting vermin, coarse and blasphemous in their language. He proclaimed a saving Gospel to them, however, any many even of such companions he was instrumental in leading to Christ and His service. So dreadful was the condition of his cell toward the end of his imprisonment, that an Inquisitor who had gone up to confer with him there hurried back after a few moments, almost choked by the vile odors he had breathed, and unable to restrain a violent fit of vomiting. It is a question whether this part of the martyrdom might not more truly deserve the name than the brief moments of torture at the stake.

At last, four months after he had been brought to the Hague, on the 14th of July, 1525, Pistorius was confronted with the Inquisitors. A few unimportant conferences had taken place before, but now began the real trial. Five dignitaries—three ecclesiastical, the real Inquisitors, and two laymen, a Burgomaster of the Hague, and the Procurator-Fiscal—were appointed to conduct the examination. It lasted all that forenoon and all of the afternoon till dark. The next day another session was held. Every argument that these men could think of failed to move him from his purpose to oppose the errors of Rome. Every appeal to Scripture authority resulted in triumph for the prisoner and confusion to the Inquisitors, who invariably sought to shift the argument adroitly over to the more convenient ground of the authority of the Church, but were not permitted to do so by the Reformer without instant exposure. He placed the right of the clergy to marry upon unassailable Scripture grounds, and demanded of them, in the matter of practical results, which was more likely to preserve the purity of the clergy, an honorable marriage, or the unlimited profligacy in which many were known to live, but which was pardoned lightly at every confession, only to be indulged in again. To this unanswerable and legitimate argumentum ad hominem, a coarse reply was made at a later period of the trial by the President of the Mechlin Court, to the effect that he wished Pistorius had committed the crime in question ten times over, rather than have married, for then he would have given them infinitely less trouble!

After the examination which took place on the 15th of July, Pistorius was remanded back to prison for a month. Meanwhile, the Regent of the Netherlands, Count Hoogstraaten, Stadtholder of Holland, and the whole Privy Council of the Emperor Charles, had come to the Hague. To the three Ecclesiastical Inquisitors, who were also Professors of Theology at Louvain, was now added the President of the Supreme Court at Mechlin. Four eminent lawyers were also invited to attend the next examination. This took place in the presence of these august personages in the great hall of the Court at the Hague. It effected no more satisfactory results than the preceding trials. Pistorius remained firm. He was accordingly condemned to be strangled and his body to be burned at the stake.

On the 15th of September, 1525, a large platform was erected in the centre of the so-called "Inner Court" (Binnenhof), in the Hague. The present Parliament buildings were formerly the residence of the Counts of Holland, and later were occupied by the Princes of Orange, as chiefs of the Dutch Republic, and hence received the name of Prinsenhof, or Prince's Palace. A martyrdom, political indeed, but largely the result of bitterness produced by controversies in the Protestant Church of Holland, was suffered here almost a century later, when on this same Binnenhof the head of Barneveld fell beneath the executioner's sword. Now, in 1525, various eminent ecclesiastical dignitaries, clad in their full regalia, the professors from Louvain, the President of the Imperial Court, Count Hoogstraaten, and the Regent Margaret, were seated in great state upon this platform. The ceremonies of the degradation of Pistorius from the priestly office were performed with their usual pomp. He was then clad in a yellow tunic, a fool's cap of the same gaudy hue was placed upon his head, and thus arrayed he was led to the place of execution. This was located within a stone's throw of the prison gate, and was familiarly known as "het Groene Zoodje"—(the green sod). Here, during several generations, was the spot where criminals breathed their last on the block or upon the gallows, while it may now be identified by a stone post, standing not far from the banks of the Vyver.

Arrived here, Pistorius calmly mounted the pile of faggots and placed himself firmly against the iron stake in the centre. He adjusted the garrote around his neck with his own hands, and exclaimed: "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? Death is swallowed up in victory through Christ!" With a final prayer for his enemies and for his own soul upon his lips, he resigned himself to the executioner's hands and was strangled to death. The fire was then kindled and his body consumed to ashes. A contemporary writes of his death: "One would have thought (from the appearance of his countenance after the strangling) that our martyr had fallen into a sweet sleep; and this was really so. For he lives now, freed from all misery, with Christ, who, since his confession of the name of Christ even unto his death, never forsook him. May this strength also be imparted to us, even until the end, by that God who is to be praised above all through all eternity. Amen."*

Patty's Thanksgiving Present.

A Story of the Life-Saving Service.

BY REV. EDWARD A. RAND.

"OH! Oh! Oh! A rocket!" said Patty Seavey, looking out from her little chamber window upon the harbor, or where the harbor was, for a snow-storm had been weaving a vail with soft white meshes to hide it, and then came the night, which wove in such dark strands that the harbor was completely covered. But there was a line of fire with uneven, confused edges, suddenly shooting up through that vail, and for a moment dividing it! Patty knew what it meant.

"A wreck, a wreck!" she cried. "Oh, it must be Maggie Jones' father! Let me go down and tell mother."

The day before she and Maggie Jones, at school, had warmly disputed about the respective merits of their fathers, a foolish subject for debate; but it should be said that Maggie betrayed Patty into it.

"Well," said Patty, "my father goes to sea in the bigger vessel, and he is coming home soon."

"Eh," said Maggie, "my father goes in the fastest schooner, and I expect him to-day or to-morrow to spend Thanksgiving. When your father comes—I hope—he will drown!"

That evil wish staggered Patty. "Oh, Maggie!" she said, horror-struck, and tears filling her eyes, she turned away.

Patty told her mother what Maggie had said, and declared that it made her "feel dreadfully."

Her mother replied: "I dare say she was sorry for it the moment she said it."

"But she did not look so, mother. I just hate her. She did not look sorry a bit."

"Perhaps not. Any way, let it go, Patty. Let the bad feeling against Maggie go. When you say your prayers, make a present of your bad feeling to your Saviour."

"He wouldn't get much, mother."

"But He likes to have just such gifts made to Him, such ugly feelings brought to Him and surrendered to Him. It won't make a good bedfellow for anybody, such a feeling as that, you know."

"I know it, mother, and I will give it up," said Patty, decidedly.

When she knelt after tea in her little chamber, her low tones and the murmur of the wind without mingled, but while the cry of Patty meant forgiveness and peace, that of the wind meant disaster and possibly wreck. And in the night, when Patty chanced to be awake, turning her eyes toward a front window, there was that jagged pathway of fire up into the sky.

"There is Maggie's father!" exclaimed Patty. "What if that be her father's vessel that has come to-night only to be lost? Oh, dear! oh, dear! What time is it, I wonder? I must hurry down and tell mother."

"What, Patty! A wreck this stormy night!" exclaimed Mrs. Seavey, when told about the rocket. "I'll get up at once! Why, why! Three o'clock!" she said, lighting a lamp and going to the clock.

* "Groot Martelaarsboek," pp. 103–128. The account here is the history of this martyrdom, written by Gnapheus, Rector of a Latin school at the Hague, and a friend and fellow-prisoner of Pistorius. It was originally published in Latin. Brandt, in his "Historie der Reformatie," devotes some pages to this martyr. There is also an interesting account of John Pistorius in Rev. M. G. Hansen's "Reformed Church in the Netherlands," pp. 29–34.

"It is Thanksgiving morning." Then she went to the window. "Oh, there is another rocket, Patty! Right down in our harbor and near us! I wonder if our life-saving men know it. I don't believe they do. And we are the only house round here for a mile."

"The men at the station don't come up the harbor-way to look round, mother. They won't know of it. Oh, dear! Just think of it, and Maggie's father, you know, may be out there."

"Yes, only think of it! Are not you glad you forgave her?"

"Yes, indeed."

There was a life-saving station a mile away on a beach that joined one extremity of the "lower harbor," as it was more accurately termed (to distinguish it from another farther inland and where the village was). The surfmen only patrolled the beach, considering the lower harbor to be comparatively safe, but in storms like the present it was much exposed. They were not likely to see any rocket sent from the harbor, for a high bluff stretched back of the beach, concealing the harbor, and then the snow-storm would interfere with the view.

"Oh, dear!" said Patty's mother. "If I were well I believe I would go down myself to the station and tell them. Nobody else to go to them. Maggie's folks live over in the woods a mile from here."

"They won't know about her father—just think—till morning. But you must not go, mother."

"No; I suppose a woman getting up from pneumonia ought not to venture out into this storm."

"Of course not! You haven't been out at all," declared Patty wisely, shaking her head. "Mother, let me go! I can go just as well as not. I can take the barn-lantern and take Rover, you know."

How Patty's eyes flashed, as if they were full of rockets going off! And Rover? That big, noble, black, four-footed friend of the family, stirred out of his warm nest behind the stove, and, coming forward, stretched himself out at full length, yawned, drew himself up, and then shook himself, snapping his eyes, wagging his tail, and opening his mouth as if he wished to say, "Here is Rover, and he is on hand for anything you want of him."

"There, mother, I should be safe as could be. A girl twelve years old and that big dog? I should be safer than you, mother, without the dog."

"Oh, nothing would happen to me, Patty. See! Another rocket! If I ever!"

"Maggie's poor father! I must go, mother, quick."

"But the snow?"

"I don't believe it is too deep. I will go out and see."

She ran to the door, stepped out among the pure white flakes, and then ran back.

"The snow is not up to the top of my boots. Oh, let me go!"

"Well, wait a minute. The men from the station will go by here when they do go. Perhaps they are coming now."

In silence mother and daughter waited.

"Nothing, mother. Now I must go." Soon, bundled up against the storm, Patty was trudging, lantern in hand, toward the station. Rover bounded at her side, in front and behind her, as if to assure Patty that she had a body-guard numerous enough to go all about her. There were murmuring forests to go through, hills to trudge up and hills to trudge down, valleys to traverse, and all the way there was a great woolly mat of white about Patty's feet. Every track in the road was covered up, and Patty went forward as if into a world entirely new, like Christopher Columbus when he sailed toward an undiscovered country. "And there is the light in the window of the station! See it, Rover," cried Patty.

Yes, Rover saw it and barked. He was getting a little tired of these snowflakes sliding down through the air in such numberless crowds, and he wanted to find a different companionship, a human being like Patty, and if there wasn't one in the kitchen of the station, whose door Patty now opened! It was Simes Laighton, sitting half asleep before the stove, but starting up in a dazed fashion when Rover bounded up to him, and recognizing an old friend, leaped up and planted his fore paws on Simes' breast.

"Why, what are you here for?" said the astonished Simes to Patty.

"Why, Simes, there is a wreck up in the harbor. It has been firing rockets—and—'

Simes did not wait to hear any more. What a change took place in the man! The drowsy watchman before the stove became an excited herald, rushing upstairs to the crew's sleeping quarters, and shouting: "Turn out! turn out! Wreck up in the harbor! Turn out! All hands on deck! Wreck up in the harbor!"

What a change now in that hitherto quiet station! Men tramping heavily overhead, shouting on the stairs, rushing to the boat room, dragging out the cart furnished with life-saving apparatus, and then all pushing up the white road that Patty had travelled. The two patrols out on the beach who had seen nothing as they plodded along at the foot of the high bluff, now joined the rescue party, and away they all went, men in sou'westers, pea-jackets, long-legged rubber boots, swinging lanterns, tugging at the hand-cart. Somewhere behind came Patty and Rover.

"Oh, dear! Hope they will be in time to get Maggie's father!" Patty would sometimes say. The surfmen would have seen at the window of the Seavey home a woman's face looking out, if they had only been looking for it.

"Oh, there they go!" said Patty's mother. "Good! The dear girl got to them! Oh, I hope they will save Maggie's father and the others in his crew."

When Patty came she wanted to follow the surfmen to the shore of the harbor, but her mother told her to be patient.

"You see, Patty," she said, "You told them to bring anybody here."

"Yes, the keeper wanted to know if he might, because it was so near. They may have to get their boat, though they say it is awful rough, and they think they will have to shoot a line to the wreck. Oh, don't I wish I could see them!"

"Well, dear, they may have to wait until it is light enough to see how to operate their—whatever they call it—their wreck apparatus, and it would be chilly on the beach for you."

They "operated" as soon as possible. They shot with their Lyle gun a line to the wreck. Then other lines were sent, and soon a life-car went above the howling, leaping, frothing waves, safely reaching the vessel, and safely bringing to the snowy land all on board. Clinging to the spray-washed hull, how glad they were to come ashore! Then they went to Mrs. Seavey's, who, with Patty had been busy bringing clothing down into the kitchen for the rescued men, spreading a table with all the good things that the house held, and making as much coffee as their big and their small pots would hold. This was in readiness for their expected visitors.

"How soon do you suppose they will come?" asked Patty again and again, looking out of the window. "I will give Maggie's father an extra cup of coffee," thought Patty.

Finally they came, a lot of men nipped by the cold and staggering along. Some of the surfmen were helping the poor, frost-bitten fellows.

"Here we are!" shouted Capt. Thomas, the keeper of the station, as he entered the Seavey home, "and I brought you a Thanksgiving present!"

He led forward—Patty's father!

Yes, it was the vessel in which Patty's father sailed that had been wrecked.

"Oh, I guessed the wrong man!" screamed the dear girl, throwing herself into her father's arms.

Because it was not Maggie's father, was Patty's "Thanksgiving present" any the less acceptable?

New York Port Society.

IN visiting the various institutions of this city, I called at the rooms of the New York Port Society, situated on the corner of Madison and Catharine streets, which has been so remarkably successful in reforming and saving the seafaring men. I ascertained that the key-note of their work was in personal interview with these men in the inquiry rooms. "For further information," said one of the officers, "let us go through a day's work as conducted by the missionaries. It is as follows: Prayer meetings are held daily, morning and evening, at the close of each of which, as the men come out into the reading-room, the missionaries address them and conduct such of them as are disposed to go, into the inquiry-rooms, where they interview them respecting their spiritual state, read and explain to them the Scriptures and pray with them. Thus, one by one, they are brought to Christ.

"At mid-day the missionaries go down on the wharves and on board the vessels in the harbor, and also into the boarding-houses, distributing Bibles, Testaments, tracts and invitation cards, inviting the seamen to come to the prayer meetings and reading-room, which is open all day from 8 o'clock in the morning to 10 o'clock at night. This is repeated day after day."

"What are the results of your labors?"

"That is a question not easily answered, for the results of our labors are not limited by time; but I can say that one of the results is that we have the satisfaction of seeing at least a score of these men, on an average, apply for church membership every month."

"How is this society supported?"

"Wholly by voluntary contributions."

"How does your treasury now stand?"

"It is empty. It would be a source of great delight if some of our wealthy citizens would come to our help and replenish our treasury, and thus supply the means for furthering this noble work and giving to the weather-beaten sailor the bread and the water of life."

VISITOR.

Baptism of Three Hebrews.

AS the fruit of the public services in the Hebrew-Christian Church on St. Mark's place in this city, to say nothing of what has been done in private conversation, tract distribution, etc., many souls have been converted. Several talented young men are now preparing for the Christian ministry. We were present on a Sunday evening in October and witnessed the solemn sight of three Hebrews testifying their faith in the Lord Jesus by receiving the ordinance of Holy Baptism. Are there not many of the Lord's stewards who will freely give of their riches to carry forward this necessary undertaking?

I am positive that if the readers of the INTELLIGENCER knew of the good work which is being done for the Jewish population of this city, through this Church, they would, by their occasional presence, cheer the heart of its pastor, the Rev. Jacob Freshman.

Great good is being done at this mission, which is constantly opening up new departments. It has now weekly, six different services, all of the most interesting kind.

She is an exceptionally fine illustration of what the Gospel can do in the direction of civilizing and lifting up to a high plane of life the long-neglected Indian people.

....Professor Delitzsch, of Leipsig, is leading a movement in nine German universities, having for its object, mission work among the Jews. Already over three hundred students at the universities have joined the movement. It is stated in a German newspaper, that in Vienna alone, during 1885, two hundred and sixty Jews became Christians.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“BECKONINGS FOR EVERY DAY.” Arranged by Lucy Larcom. This book of extracts from the writings of noble thinkers, arranged so as to be read day by day, is superior to the numerous “calendars” which come with each new year. It has taken years in its preparation, it contains some of the best expressions of the best writers in poetry and prose, and, above all, it turns the mind chiefly to the great centre of the highest thought, the Divine-Human Saviour. We commend it heartily as among the very best Year-books we have ever seen. It is inspiring and elevating from beginning to end. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

....“THE GREAT DEBATE.” Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. have published in pamphlet form A Verbatim Report of the Discussion at the late meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, at Des Moines, Iowa, upon the relations of that association and its missionaries to the New Theology respecting the future probation of the heathen who have not heard of the “Historic Christ.” The report is valuable for its immediate interest and for careful preservation.

....“THE STORY OF CARTHAGE” (“Story of the Nations Series”) is fortunate in having been assigned to the pen of one who, perhaps more than any living scholar, has the genius for making “the dead past” live on his historic pages, Prof. Alfred J. Church. There have been few episodes in the history of mankind as thrilling, heroic, and tragic as the seven centuries of the Carthaginian story. Nor has there ever been a history of greater unity in purpose or events, or in the personality of its leaders. It is one continuous record of warlike conflict, with the passing power of Greece and the growing power of Rome. We cannot help feeling in sympathy with Carthage in its struggle for very existence with the latter, and yet we tremble at the thought of what the history of the world would have been, had the contest resulted otherwise. Prof. Church deepens our sympathy and admiration for this ill-fated people, notwithstanding that the authorities by which he has to be guided are universally prejudiced witnesses for their enemies. He repudiates the comparative justice of the stigma attached to “Punic faith.” His narrative is absorbing in its vivid and dramatic interest, and his portraitures of the great leaders on both sides—the Hannibals, Hamilcars, Hasdrubals, and Scipios—are likelike and clear-cut. Like all the other volumes of this admirable series, the “Story of Carthage” is full of valuable illustrations, largely of an archæological nature, and is well indexed. Adequate attention is also given to the legendary and primitive annals, and to the civic and internal history of the people. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“THE BOY TRAVELLERS IN THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE.” By Thomas W. Knox. Here is another charming book for boys, and in respect to the geography of the country, the manners, customs and every-day life of the people, as instructive as it is charming. It is profusely illustrated, having more pictures than pages, the pages numbering over five hundred. It also includes two excellent maps of the Russian Empire, with red dotted lines indicating the routes taken and described by “The Boy Travellers.” It is handsomely bound, the lids being illuminated with gold and variegated tints harmoniously blended. In all these noted particulars it compares favorably with the two popular companion volumes by the same author—“The Boy Travellers in the East,” and “The Boy Travellers in South America.” About the same plan that characterizes those volumes, the author has adopted in this work. Attended by the versatile and accomplished mentor, Dr. Bronson, the boys, Frank Bassett and Fred Bronson, pursue their journey across the Russian Empire, and record their adventures. The book has a fascination for older eyes than boys', and should find a place on the family Christmas tree for the boy of the house. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“PEBBLES FROM THE BROOK,” “LITTLE STORIES FOR LITTLE PEOPLE,” “LITTLE DROPS OF WATER,” “GEMS FOR BANDS OF HOPE,” “FIRESIDE STORIES,” and “OUR PETS,” are the titles of the six dainty volumes of “The Brooklet Series,” edited by Miss L. Penney. Each book has on every other page a picture, of which the little story or poem on the companion page is a description. So, every lesson is doubly enforced, and more indelibly imprinted on the child's mind. They are beautifully bound in ornamented cloth, and enclosed in a neat box, all at the small cost of $1.50. (National Temperance Society and Publication House.)

....“CHIVALRIC DAYS.” By E. S. Brooks. Mr. Brooks has made a capital book for the boys and girls of these days. By a series of stories of other times and many lands, about the boys and girls who made those days chivalric, he aims to teach that “all days may be full of chivalry, all deeds may be instinct with that earnestness of purpose that lives in the heart of every well regulated boy and girl.” Egypt, Carthage, Rome, Paris, England, Servia, France, New York, all furnish examples, presented in chaste though familiar style, and certain to captivate the fortunate boys and girls into whose hands the book may fall. (Putnams.)

....“LEFT IN THE WILDERNESS.” By Mary A. Roe. The struggles of our pioneers, as eighty years ago they settled in Ohio and the near territories, are still told around Western firesides. This excellent book brings those experiences forward in a very striking manner, and recounts many actual occurrences in private history. The American boys of to-day will be made far nobler and manlier by reading such tales as this, and throwing aside the foolish trash which is simply false and misleading in all its adventurous scenes. (Phillips & Hunt.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....General Francis A. Walker has written some valuable articles for The Youth's Companion on “Trade Schools for Boys.”

....M. Paul Leroi makes his first appearance in the current number of the Magazine of Art, treating the American Salon in the Paris exhibition of 1886 in highly complimentary terms. He says of the American contributors: “We cannot without dishonesty refuse to doff our hats, and recognize that they have come in easily a good first.” The paper has four engravings, one full page, of the pictures he commends. Art in Canada, relating to pictures hung in the Colonial Exhibition, written by R. A. M. Stevenson, and richly illustrated, is another agreeable contribution. Some Historic Gloves, by S. Wm. Beck, has engravings of gloves of the time of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth, and of Shakespeare's gloves. St. James's Palace is graphically described by W. J. Loftie and fully illustrated. The number closes the ninth volume. A new volume begins with December—a good time to subscribe for a magazine which is doing more to form a taste for true art than any other publication in this country, and which comprehends the art of all ages.

....The Century for November has for a frontispiece a fine portrait of Abraham Lincoln, followed by the first pages of the history of the great war President, by John G. Nicolay and John Hay. In the successive instalments of this history the readers of the Century have the promise of a rich treat. General Hooker's Appointment and Removal, and The Battle of the First Day at Gettysburg, are the subjects of the war articles. “Old Chelsea” is well-written up and illustrated. It is a deeply interesting number all through, and sustains admirably the good repute of the magazine.

....Lippincott's Magazine for November is quite startling in its “new departures.” In the first place, it returns to the plan of coming out before the date of publication. Secondly, it adds a department of “Book Talk,” by the editor. Thirdly, it adds nearly a hundred pages to its ordinary size. And lastly and chiefly, it begins the publication of a complete novellette in every number. This is to be a permanent feature of the magazine, and we predict for it a great success. People are growing tired of serial novels, and the “short story” is getting pretty well worn out from a lack of novelty of incident. The “Lippincott” experiment combines the attractions, and avoids the defects, of both. John Habberton, of “Helen's Babies” fame, begins the series with a graphic and breezy story of Southwestern life, entitled “Bruerton's Bayou.” He will be followed by Mrs. Burnett, Edgar Fawcett, and others. Six of the other articles in this number are devoted to Journalism in its various aspects. A trenchant exposure of the faults of modern “Newspaperism” is given; also “Reflections and Recollections,” by the well-known correspondent “Gath” (George Alfred Townsend). Miss Gilder, editor of The Critic, furnishes “My Journalistic Experiences,” and the editor of the Norristown Herald tells how he “became a funny man.” Other articles are a story, “A Newspaper Affair,” by Edwin F. Bishop; “Our Earthquake,” by Felix L. Oswald; and a personal reminiscence of King Ludwig of Bavaria, by Lew Vanderpool.

....The Pulpit Treasury for November has for its distinctive features a frontispiece portrait of Bishop H. N. McTyeire, D.D., and his sermon preached at the ordination of the four new bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and portraits of Joseph Staunton Key, D.D., William Wallace Duncan, D.D., Charles Betts Galloway, D.D., and Eugene Russell Hendrix, D.D., accompanied by brief [illegible]ir lives. There are also presented views of Wesley Monumental Church, Savannah, Ga., and Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn. The magazine is attractive and shows enterprise.

....The three numbers of the Monthly Interpreter for August-October contain the usual variety of learned exegetical papers. Among these are Principal Douglas's notes on the revision of the English Old Testament, which touch some points not mentioned by other critics, and Prof. Milligan's acute series on the Resurrection of the Dead, which illumine several of the obscurities in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians. Dr. Shanks contributes a clever statement of the Argument of the Book of Job, and Prof. Redford commences what promises to be a sober and satisfactory exposition of the Song of Solomon. The editor shows great skill in getting contributions from the best scholars in Great Britain.

....Wide Awake for November opens with a charming poem called “Muriel's Thanksgiving,” by Mary Bradley. A highly interesting and fully illustrated article relating to the history of Pocahontas and the Rolfes is entitled “The Story of Two Names.” “Patem's Salmagundi,” by E. S. Brooks, tells how a Thanksgiving day was held on Manhattan Island in the time of Governor Stuyvesant. The sketches of the Empress Eugenie and of Queen Christina of Spain, are worth reading. This number closes the twenty-third volume of Wide Awake.

PERIODICALS.

November.—The Old Testament Student, Babyhood, The Musical Herald, The Art Journal.

December.—The Quiver, The Magazine of Art.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

First (January) Number Ready December 15th.

SCOPE.—SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE will be in the widest sense a magazine of general literature; and its main purpose will be to bring together not only good reading, but literature of lasting value.

ILLUSTRATION.—Each number will be fully illustrated, and in a manner which shall be in the best sense illustrative of the text. The artistic side of the magazine will represent the most spirited, sincere, and original work.

Among the many interesting and important papers to be printed in the Magazine during the first year are the remarkable series of the existence of which has only recently become publicly known, and concerning which the greatest expectation and curiosity have been aroused. Their importance and interest will more than justify this. Nothing more characteristic or of greater autobiographic value has been published, and no such study of the great novelist's life has been hitherto possible. Fac-similes of unpublished drawings will accompany the Letters.

Several articles giving very striking personal views of great historic events and periods; notable among them told by him from his papers, private diaries, and personal recollection of an experience absolutely unique, as he was the only member of the Diplomatic Corps remaining in the city and in communication with the changing governments during this whole period. The articles will all be fully illustrated from original material in the author's possession.

GLIMPSES AT THE DIARIES OF GOUVERNEUR MORRIS,

U. S. Minister to France at the close of the last century, will give an idea of the interesting and piquant pictures of social life and characters of the time of the French Revolution, which exist among the great unpublished portions of the Morris papers that relate to his residence in Paris.

In FICTION there will be many notable attractions. The publishers expect to begin during the present year the publication of a striking novel, which has been arranged for with who will also contribute a shorter story to an early number.

With the earliest numbers will be begun a very strong and original

NOVEL, BY HAROLD FREDERIC, entitled "Seth's Brother's Wife," the scene of which is laid in a new field—Central New York.

A STORY, BY H. C. BUNNER, which has to do with a most interesting phase of New York life, will prove especially attractive and original in its subject and method. It is illustrated by A. B. Frost, Hopkinson Smith and George Wharton Edwards.

Among the other interesting features of the first numbers will be:

A Novelette by
J. S. of Dale (F. J. STIMSON).

SHORT STORIES by Joel Chandler Harris,
T. A. Janvier (IVORY BLACK),
Sarah Orne Jewett,
Octave Thanet,
H. H. Boyesen,
Margaret Crosby, and many other well-known authors, besides notable stories by new writers.

Francis A. Walker contributes a striking article on SOCIALISM.

Rev. William Hayes Ward (Editor of The Independent), writes of the BABYLONIAN SEAL-CYLINDERS—the paper will be beautifully illustrated.

John C. Ropes gives an exquisitely illustrated paper upon the EXISTING LIKENESSES OF CÆSAR;

Capt. F. V. Greene, U. S. Engineers, a suggestive article on our Coast Defences;

Edwin H. Blashfield a most interesting study in art history with drawings by the author.

Many other important illustrated articles and papers upon literary topics, etc., etc., are reserved for later announcement.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER

[The following thoughtful paper, by Mrs. Nichols, of Tarrytown, was read at a Missionary Convention at Peekskill, Oct. 14th.]

The Primary Object of Missionary Societies.

WHAT IS THE PRIMARY OBJECT? IS IT THE RAISING OF MONEY?

OUR Saviour, the Author of mission work, was so poor He had not where to lay His head. His disciples, whom He sent out,—the first missionaries,—were poor men, and were sent forth without purse, or scrip, or shoes, or even bread, as lambs among wolves. They were not even to think of their sustenance. The command to preach was to engross all their attention, sustained by faith in Him who had commanded. As the opening heavens were about to receive their ascending Lord, the great command was given, to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. Those poor men, who had forsaken all for Christ, alone, despised, in the midst of enemies who had crucified their Lord—their now risen Master taken from them—did they shrink before these almost overwhelming difficulties? The record tells us "they returned to Jerusalem with great joy." And they continued in prayer for days, waiting for the promised gift of the Holy Spirit. The blessing came, and these poor unlettered men became a power. Through their preaching the glad tidings spread everywhere, and, before the destruction of Jerusalem, churches were founded throughout most of the known world and converts were multiplied, even to Cæsar's household. Thus was mission work begun—without money, without friends, with nothing to lean upon but simple faith. The conversion of the world to Christ, the end. Obedience the impelling motive.

The command was universal and binding upon all Christians. But, of course, all cannot go personally to the heathen, and hence missionary societies are formed at home. Their primary object is one and the same with that of all mission work—the means only differ. They do that at home which is essential to the work abroad. By meeting together they unite their prayers, and together cultivate a missionary spirit, and consecration of heart and life and substance to the work. By the diffusion of intelligence they interest the indifferent. They train the young—some of them to become missionaries—and send them forth. And last, but not least, they cultivate a spirit of liberal, systematic giving. Thus they as truly obey the great command as do those who go.

The one motive, obedience. The one desire, that the glad tidings of salvation may be given to every creature, inspiring alike the hearts of both.

From this high standpoint, and no other, can efficient work be done. To this only is the promise given, "Lo, I am with you alway." Let the end become secondary, and means be exalted in its place, the controlling motive is gone and the reward in spiritual blessings is lost, the whole service becomes degraded and human means have to be resorted to, which prove weak, spasmodic and, perhaps, sometimes wrong. Plainly, the primary object of missionary societies is the conversion of the world to Christ. It is not money raising.

The same faith, the same zeal for the Master, the same love for souls for whom Christ died, that carried the early Christians joyfully through persecutions and to cruel deaths, must produce the same results to-day, for the promise stands unchanged. But why has this question—so easy to answer—been asked?

Have means and ends become so interwoven that the one is, or may be, mistaken for the other? Is it not possible that there lurks in the form of the question, "money raising," a fatal error? It is hardly found in the Bible, our only guide, while liberal, systematic giving is often enjoined, both in the Old Testament and in the New, and numerous instances are given to enforce it. When a tabernacle was to be erected in the wilderness, only willing offerings were accepted, and the result was an overflowing treasury, so that the people were commanded to stop. Their gifts were their precious things—their jewels, their labor.

When a temple was needed that God might have a visible place of worship, David designed, and Solomon, with willing mind and willing helpers, executed the great design. After the return from the captivity a second temple was required, and willing offerings were made. When the saints at Jerusalem, persecuted and poor, needed assistance that they might linger and grow in the Christian life, those who had possessions, with hearts aglow with their new-born life, sold them that they might give to the Lord. Ananias and Sapphira, too, sold their possession, an *un*willing offering, and were rejected.

How is it with the Church to-day? Is a desire for the conversion of the world to Christ so absorbing that willing offerings are laid upon His altar till treasuries overflow? Are they praying and waiting, as did the disciples at Jerusalem, for the outpouring of the Spirit, that nations may be born in a day? Doubtless many are. But does not a desire to raise money too often engross all the thought and effort? Is not the conscience too often satisfied if money enough is raised—not given—by willing hearts to the work? One thing is certain: treasuries do not overflow, and human devices are resorted to and special efforts are often called for to prevent bankruptcy. Statistics show that a small sum yearly from each church member would yield an abundance for missionary work. The conclusion seems inevitable that something is wrong. Wheels which should run smoothly are clogged, the work is up hill, and leaders grow faint and discouraged.

It is always a mistake when we attempt to improve upon God's way. The guide given us is perfect, we have only to study and follow it. In that there is one object, one way. But what is to be done when the offerings fail? The wheels when once set in motion must move on. We cannot let our missionaries starve. We cannot give up the work.

What saith the Lord? When the Israelites fled before the men of Ai, and Joshua in despair lay prostrate in the dust, the Lord said to him, "Get thee up," "Israel hath sinned," "Cast out the unclean thing." They obeyed and went on to victory. And again, "Bring all your tithes into the storehouse and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it." "Freely ye have received, freely give."

Our Dear Old Lady of Dorp.

IF you look on the map of our "Empire State," of which we New Yorkers are all so justly proud, you will never, even with a magnifying glass, I fear, find this unique old town of Dorp, dating back its origin and ancestry to the time when Albany was known as Fort Orange. Its name lengthened with the lengthening years and lost its Dutch significance long ago. Not so the names seen on every street and sign of the quaint old town, names dear to those who still speak with pride of their Knickerbocker descent. For here on every side are seen the Van Vrankins, Van Aukens, Van Alystines, Van Allens, Van Benthuysens, Van Epps, Van Pattens, Van Slycks; the Vedders and the Veeders, the Hoegerbooms and Hoetailings, Schermerhorns, Schumachers and Schuylers, and, as for the rest of them, are they not all written down on the evergreen branches of the family tree of many a Dorpian?

Time will not permit us to speak of the Indian massacre of long ago, or even of the old time college, beckoning from the hill to all who will, that they may come and partake of its classic fare. Ah, no! it is not of them that we would tell to-day, but of our dear old Lady of Dorp. At the foot of College Hill nestles a quiet, pleasant home.

Let us enter. Two little rockers sit cosily side by side in the parlor. Here, almost always, for many a year could be found our old lady, bright, active, with ever a smile of welcome, as her hand motioned to the seat scarcely ever vacant at her side, for hosts of friends delighted to do her honor.

"The shadow of a crown" lingered in her silvery hair, for ninety-two winters had snowed it over till it became indeed a coronet of glory. The ear, it is true, was a little muffled, but it was ever quick to hear the voice of love. The eye was a little dimmed, but it always saw the smile of friends. And she ever gave a warm and cheery greeting to those who loved to listen to her kind and gentle speech.

Everyone looked upon her with admiring reverence. She was neither an ordinary Christian, nor in any way an ordinary woman. She was sympathetic in all her views, and as an old friend said, who knew her well through many years, she had "the bold, free spirit of inquiry, saved from scepticism and made humbly devout by an adoring apprehension of the infinite." Hers was a quiet, peaceful life, filled with thoughtfulness for others and unfailing devotion to duty. How abiding such a life! The memory of its deeds of kindness and its gentle words of peace will long linger as the fragrance of a sweet perfume, even when the vase that enclosed it is crushed.

For she is gone! Those of us who laughed and chatted with her a week or two ago can scarcely realize that the Master suddenly called her home. Tenderly those gray-haired boys upon the "hill," who cherished her as their foster-mother, carried her home one twilight and laid her to rest among the friends of her youth, while the glorified spirit winged itself to the loving Father beyond.

At last the silent ears are unstopped that she may listen to the glad hosannas. The dimmed eyes see the glories of her celestial home. Freed from the frailties of the body, her bright spirit rejoices in the presence of the Father whom she ever praised and loved. Only the memory of her wise sayings and loving words remains to guide us on our pilgrimage to old age.

It was but the other day she said, "I have lived a long and a happy life. I am ready to go." "You promised to be a hundred," answered a friend, "we cannot spare you yet." She smiled; "It is time I go," and to another at her bedside remarked, "I am so glad I have lived in this wonderful age when knowledge has increased so rapidly."

The secret of her happy old age was a lovely Christian experience, an abiding faith, and then an intense love of knowledge of all kinds. Reading was her delight; one of the last books she read with pleasure being Stanley's "Through the Dark Continent." To her many friends she constantly said: "If you would be happy in old age have resources within yourself. Cultivate a love of reading above all, for that pleasure never fails."

Let us all profit by her wisdom. While still young, or in middle age, may we gain a taste for those things which, in the years of feebleness and weakness that will surely come, will be a joy to ourselves and a delight to our children. Above all, let her example stimulate us to lead a beautiful Christian life. For what can be more sad in old age or in youth than a Christless burial in a godless grave; upon the tombstone only the word, "Despair!"

It is no wonder so many old people are fretful, irritable and unhappy. For if they have no "hope," either for this world or for the world to come, they are "of all men most miserable."

When it shall be said of us "We all do fade as a leaf," may the autumn of our lives be as peaceful, as beautiful and calm as that of Mrs. Olivia Fiske.

Books for Home Reading.

....A noble volume, over the pages of which we have lingered with appreciative interest, is "WOMAN IN SACRED SONG," edited by Eva Munson Smith. Gathering her materials from widely different places and periods, Mrs. Smith has compiled her selections with rare taste, and has given her sisters a book in which is something to suit every mood, to while away many a weary and comfort many a sorrowful hour; a book to please the children, to cheer the invalid, to satisfy the fastidious, and to delight the good. Turning the beautiful pages, we find some of our dearest old favorites, and are surprised by the melody of some poetry which will hereafter be beloved. Mrs. Smith's industry and perseverance are evident. While she has ransacked libraries, she has looked over files of newspapers and magazines, and rescued from obscurity waifs which deserve the permanence of a volume. One of the sweetest poems in the book is from the versatile pen of Marion Harland, "A Sunset Prophecy," while from Celia Thaxter's repertoire is culled that cheery song, "The Sunrise Never Failed Us Yet." Mrs. Margaret J. Preston is represented by a number of characteristic poems, a great many tuneful, singable hymns are chosen from the unobtrusive work of Fanny Crosby. Mrs. Grace Hinsdale contributes several hymns full of spiritual insight, and some very true work comes from the compiler herself. Mary Lowe Dickinson, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Mrs. Browning, Alice and Phebe Cary, a host, in short, of the living who remain and the dead who yet speak, join in this choir, entitled "Woman in Sacred Song." (D. Lothrop & Co.)

...."GOOD READING: Original and Selected.' There are some ten articles in this book, some prepared especially for it, and some abridged by competent hands. The work is intended as an advanced "Reader" for schools, as well as for the purpose of fostering a love of continuous reading in the home. The selections are admirable and will undoubtedly excite the interest of young readers, and the paper, printing, binding and cost of the book render it attractive to all. (Leach, Shewell & Sanborn.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

Baby's Letter.

THIS sheet, covered with idle, trailing lines,
Jagged, irregular, and rude,
Never to written words or ill-formed signs
Bearing a chance similitude,

Is to your eye only a careless scrawl
Wherein no purport can be read;
You see no meaning in these marks at all,
But inky stains and blots instead.

I know what baby fingers held the pen,
And with what earnest, anxious care
The tiny hand strove with the task, and then Gave up the effort in despair.

And so, folding the sheet with gentle touch,
This scrawl I keep, and prize above
Some fairer lines that mean not half so much,
Reading herein my baby's love.

The Little Bells' Picnic.

"SHALL we go to the picnic to-morrow, Mayette?"

"I guess so, Johnnie. Mamma says so, if she can get her work done and get the money for it."

"Why can't we go 'less mamma gets it done?"

"'Cause we can't go 'less mamma does, and she can't go without some money."

"O, I do hope we'll go, Mayette. Billy Bays says he went to one, and nobody's never seen such nice times. O, the grass was so soft and green! and you could lie down and roll all over it. And there was great big trees, and such a big brook o' water went along under the trees, and the boys made a little boat and it sailed on the water. O, wasn't it grand, Mayette? Can't you help mamma sew, so she can get it done?"

"No, John, I can't sew on that nice work of Mr. Warbut's, but I'm going to do everything so mamma won't have to stop at all, and I know she'll sew just as hard as ever she can, for she wants to go just for our sakes, she says, or she wouldn't think of it, because she needs the money for other things. But she thinks we'll like it so much. Isn't she good, Johnnie?"

"Yes, she's the goodest mamma that ever growed, and I know she'll get the work done so we can go, and won't it be splendid, Mayette, for we can wade in the brook if we want to."

"But, remember, Johnnie, mamma hasn't said she will get it done, but that she will if she can."

"But I know she will," was the declaration arising from the boy's unbounded faith in his mother's will and ability.

Marietta and Johnnie Bell were sitting on the steps of the four-roomed house where abode themselves and their widowed mother. It was in one of the narrow courts between the larger streets of a great city. Though the view was bounded by the high brick walls and gates of the back yards of certain aristocratic houses on the adjoining street, "the court" was kept perfectly clean. Its inhabitants were respectable, though poor, and their humble dwellings were to them cosy and comfortable homes. Johnnie's joyful anticipations, expressed by vigorous clappings of his little fat hands and other noisy demonstrations, soon drew other little denizens of Comper Court around him.

"What's the matter, John?" "What you hooraing so for?" were the questions asked.

"O, I am going to a picnic, and I'm so glad! so glad!"

"Well," responded Billy Bays, "you'll say it's the splendidest thing you ever went to. I didn't tell you 'bout the nice things we had to eat—the cakes and pies 'n everything, and about the squirrels and the little birds that kept singin', did I?"

"'O, we'll be joyful! we'll be joyful!'" sang Johnnie in the loudest tones he could command, as his feet briskly danced up and down on the pavement.

"I tell you, John, not to be too sure about going for fear you'll be disappointed," remarked Marietta, "but I've thought of something that I can do to help." Then she rushed in to where her mother sat sewing, and exclaimed:

"Mamma, if I thread your needles will it help?"

"Yes, dear, it will," answered the tired mother, as she glanced at the sun now far in the West.

Ettie's anxious gaze followed her mother's as she asked: "Oh, mamma, is there much more to do?"

"Yes, dear, a good many stitches."

Yet the weary mother worked on, and the patient daughter kept needles threaded and scissors or any needed implement in readiness, so that not a moment was lost. As the shades of twilight began to gather in the darkening room the last laborious stitches were taken in garments destined for the shop of a large dealer. Mrs. Bell worked at what was then rather a new business—the making up of white goods for ladies' wear, which previously had been entirely of home manufacture.

At that time, also, little party excursions to country groves and woods were less common than now. This one so gleefully anticipated by the little Bells had been arranged by some families in a distant part of the city, where Mrs. Bell had resided while her husband was yet with her. Since his death her own hands alone had obtained support for herself and her two little children. Her old neighbors, remembering her with respect and kind feelings, had invited her to join them in their trip, which was to be "to a delightful spot out of the city," they said. Had they realized her straitened circumstances, doubtless they would have mentioned in the note of invitation that she should be at no expense. But no such hint was given.

Midway in a row of lofty buildings stood the pretentious store of Warbut & Co., which Mrs. Bell, with faltering but hasty steps, approached as Sol's last rays gilded western windows and housetops. As she laid her heavy parcel upon the counter—"You are late to-day," was the address of the clerk. "You can leave your bundle, but it can't be examined now, for Miss Warbut has just gone, and of course it can't be paid for to-night."

The grievous disappointment expressed on the widow's face was noticed by the clerk, and with more sympathetic tone he said: "I'm sorry, but you ought to have come sooner."

"I came as soon as I could," was the reply, and the thought which was burning in her heart found vent. "My poor children, how disappointed they will be!" As she slowly retraced her steps, thinking what could be done to cheer the little hearts at home and make some amends for their cruel disappointment, nothing seemed practicable. "If it were not so far to the park," she mused, "so we could walk there, and I had money to get something nice for their dinner; but we can't walk so far, and the car fare would take all that I have, and to-morrow being a holiday I can't get the pay at Warbut's. At home I can make some soup with the vegetables and remnants on hand, and with this solitary quarter in my purse get us a loaf of bread and some cakes for their supper, poor little things, and that is all that I can do."

As they met her on the street corner she imprinted motherly kisses on their upturned, joyous faces, but attempted no answers to their questions. On entering her house she said:

"Darlings, I am so sorry! I was too late and could not be paid. But we will try to have a nice time at home."

"I don't want a nice time in this old house. I want to go to the woods where the brook and water is, and the boat and the squirrels 'n birds," were Johnnie's vociferations as he threw himself on the floor with loud wailing and kicking feet.

Never had disappointment fallen with more crushing weight upon human hearts than now on these little ones.

After various vain attempts to comfort her brother, Marietta turned to her mother:

"How much money would it take for us to go, mamma?"

"I couldn't undertake it with less than a dollar."

"It wouldn't take so much if only you and John went?"

"Not quite, dear."

"I'm so sorry for Johnnie. He wants to go so badly."

"But don't you want to go, too?"

"Yes, mamma, I do. But Johnnie's a boy, and he's only five years old, you know, and I'm most eight. I've got three five-cent pieces in my bank that Mrs. Jones gave me for taking care of her baby."

"I know; but you don't like to do it much, do you?"

"Not for such long spells at once, but Mrs. Jones is a real kind lady, so I don't mind it very much. If I get money enough will you take Johnnie to-morrow?"

"What! we go and you stay at home?"

"Yes, mamma, if I get the money."

"Well, Ettie, if you get the money we'll go."

"I don't mean a whole dollar, but 'most a dollar. Remember, mamma, you've promised to go if I get the money."

"But you don't think of borrowing money, do you, Ettie? You must not do that."

"No; I didn't think of any such thing."

After supper Marietta was missing from the doorstep, but in a short time returned and laid a silver dollar in her mother's hand.

"What does this mean, Marietta?"

"Why, it's the money for you and John to go to the picnic with, and I didn't take any out of my bank either."

"But where did you get it? You haven't been begging it of somebody I hope."

"No, mamma, I'm going to earn it. Goin' to begin to-morrow. Mrs. Jones is going to 'low me a whole quarter for taking care of baby all day, and she's goin' to let me earn all the rest of it. She says it's only paying me in advance; that is, to let me have it before I earn it."

"But, Ettie, do you think that John and I would be willing to go off pleasuring and leave you at home to earn the money for us to go with?"

"Why, mamma, what would be the harm when I want to do it? I want to try to be a little bit like Jesus, for you've often told us that He didn't try to please Himself, but was always doing good to somebody. And you promised me you'd go if I got the money."

"But, child, I had not a thought of your getting it."

At this moment Mrs. Jones came in.

"I am glad you have come, for I wanted to see you. It seems Mariette has been making a bargain with you. But she did not consult me about it, and as I can't agree to her plan I think she had better not be paid for her work until it is done," said Mrs. Bell, as she handed the dollar to Mrs. Jones.

"No, Mrs. Bell, I shall not take it. It's a present to Ettie. I allowed her to think that she was going to earn it. Indeed, I may say she has already earned it, for I have not paid her near as much as I expected to, and have been for some time intending to give her the dollar. You will offend me seriously if you do not let her keep it. I have come here expressly to urge you to take these dear children on the excursion to-morrow, for both you and they need it."

Soon after Mrs. Jones returned to her home, which was on the avenue just around the corner, a basket of cakes and various other dainties was packed and sent around to Mrs. Bell's.

As everything for the wonderful picnic had been so unexpectedly and bountifully provided, the entreaties of Ettie and Johnnie, also her own wishes, were yielded to by Mrs. Bell.

They all went, and even Billy Bay's highly-wrought descriptions fell very far short in the estimation of John and Ettie of the delights of such an occasion.

GARNERED.

"A SHOCK OF CORN FULLY RIPE."

In loving memory of James Patten, who died at Berne, N. Y., Oct. 28th, aged ninety-one years.

Garnered the ripened grain! So tranquil now
He lies, the peace of heaven upon his brow;
All restless tossings o'er, all weary pain,
His features worn, their wonted calm regain;
Almost he seems, with the old smile, once more
To bid us welcome at the open door.
O'erclouded thought and homesick fancies past,
Peaceful and sweet the pilgrim's rest at last.

As peaceful, sweet our memory of him;
With quiet tears the eyes that softly brim,
We talk of all his goodness,—tenderly
Recall his words, his gentle courtesy.

A Common Cold

Is often the beginning of serious affections of the Throat, Bronchial Tubes, and Lungs. Therefore, the importance of early and effective treatment cannot be overestimated. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral may always be relied upon for the speedy cure of a Cold or Cough.

Last January I was attacked with a severe Cold, which, by neglect and frequent exposures, became worse, finally settling on my lungs. A terrible cough soon followed, accompanied by pains in the chest, from which I suffered intensely. After trying various remedies, without obtaining relief, I commenced taking Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and was Speedily Cured.

I am satisfied that this remedy saved my life.—Jno. Webster, Pawtucket, R. I.

I contracted a severe cold, which suddenly developed into Pneumonia, presenting dangerous and obstinate symptoms. My physician at once ordered the use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. His instructions were followed, and the result was a rapid and permanent cure.—H. E. Simpson, Rogers Prairie, Texas.

Two years ago I suffered from a severe Cold which settled on my Lungs. I consulted various physicians, and took the medicines they prescribed, but received only temporary relief. A friend induced me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. After taking two bottles of this medicine I was cured. Since then I have given the Pectoral to my children, and consider it for Colds, Coughs, and all Throat and Lung diseases, ever used in my family.—Robert Vanderpool, Meadville, Pa.

Some time ago I took a slight Cold, which, being neglected, grew worse, and settled on my lungs. I had a hacking cough, and was very weak. Those who knew me best considered my life to be in great danger. I continued to suffer until I commenced using Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Less than one bottle of this valuable medicine cured me, and I feel that I owe the preservation of my life to its curative powers.—Mrs. Ann Lockwood, Akron, New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is considered, here, the one great remedy for all diseases of the throat and lungs, and is more in demand than any other medicine of its class.—J. F. Roberts, Magnolia, Ark.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Necessary and Unnecessary Work of the Sunday-School Teacher.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

(A Paper read at the Ninth Convention of the Kings County Sunday-School Union, N. Y.)

PART III.

THERE is another work which takes up the time and attention of the teacher and is part of the temporal duties of the school; this cannot be set aside as celebrations might be. It is as to the cloth ing to be provided for very poor children who, without this help, could not attend. At first this seems like a question to be easily settled; practically, it is not so easy. The pride of the poor makes it difficult to please them. Give little Mary Ann a neat calico dress. If she wear it to Sunday school you will find that her mother has added a fancy overskirt, so trimmed with braid or lace that the mortified teacher scarcely recognizes the pretty simple dress she had given in the bedizened apparel in which it appears. Or, the dress may be worn for one Sabbath, or two, and then the child is seen playing in the street, where the dress is so soiled and spoiled that there is soon a fresh demand upon the patience and the purse of the teacher. Where clothing is really needed by the children of worthy people the matter is quickly disposed of by providing the outfit. In such cases duty is plain. But where there exists an evident desire to get all that is to be had, and to impose upon kindness just so far as the kindness can be imposed upon, then the duty is not so plain, for the teacher conscientiously has a desire to save the children from the example of just such parents. But material for clothing is so inexpensive that I think parents could fit out their children for school more often than they do. It is not so much poverty as it is pride that cries for relief. It is the pride that craves showy apparel, so that children of poor parents may present the same appearance as those of more wealthy people. Care must be taken, or we pamper pride instead of relieving poverty.

There is no inflexible rule by which to determine how far relief should be given; such cases may be safely left to the judgment of the teacher, but let us encourage, when possible, an honest independence on the part of the parents rather than foster the inclination to lean upon others for the care of the children, for this undermines rapidly all self-respect and leads to selfishness and to idleness.

There are other forms of beneficence which sometimes are a heavy tax upon the resources of the teacher, such as the entertainment of the class at home, the offering of rewards of merit, or the interchange of gifts at Christmas or upon other occasions. As these are, however, entirely voluntary acts, and self-imposed, they are not open to the objections previously referred to. Indeed, these seem like such affectionate proofs of interest between teacher and taught that they should be encouraged. It is only when these are carried to an extreme that they are injudicious. The teacher who presents costly gifts, or offers expensive rewards to his class takes precedence, in the estimation of the children, over others who have not the pecuniary means to do the same. This leads to jealousy and ill-feeling, a tendency which is to be deplored.

All these matters, however, in the majority of cases may be safely left to adjust themselves. These are of personal interest, and the Christian teacher is not likely to make a mistake. Any genial influence brought to bear upon the class by the teacher can hardly fail to be productive of harmony and goodwill, if done in the right spirit. If such be the case we can scarcely include these in the category of amusements which do not produce the same results.

In what we have said we have thus thrown out the suggestion that, while much ought to be required of a Sunday-school teacher, there may be work and requirements of various kinds made, which are not really duties. So much time and money throughout the year are devoted to pleasing, amusing and securing attendance upon the school that it sometimes seems as if the higher object of spiritual instruction is overlooked. The whole machinery of the school has got to be expensive and cumbersome, and the attention is sometimes diverted from the main object for which the machinery is put in motion. We should discriminate between what can be dispensed with and what is really necessary for the spiritual good of the children, otherwise we shall overburden the conscientious teacher and divert funds given under a desire to help along the school, to the mere physical amusement of children who are not in need of such relief.

Could we place in one scale the noisy, bustling efforts made to increase a school numerically, and in the opposite, the loving prayerful work of the Christian teacher, acting upon the heart of the child like the silent dew upon the buried seed, which scale would show the weighter results? But we may have both, you reply. We may—but let us be careful not to throw the greater amount of work into the least important scale.

As teachers, we may have a right to throw off from our shoulders such burdens as form our unnecessary work, but God Himself has asked us to train the little ones from Him, and what He asks us to do He will give us strength to perform.

In the picture galleries of the old world you may see artists standing before the work of some great master, striving to transfer the beauty of an angel-head, or the ideal loveliness of some sweet face to the copy he is making. How constantly the sketch is compared with the original, how closely the pattern is studied so that the artist may give a true copy of what was in the mind of the great master. So let us study the picture gallery of God's Word, that we may form the children in exact likeness of the pattern He has set before us, and then our work as teachers in the Sunday-school shall not be in vain.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

Nov. 28th.—"John's Vision of Christ."—Rev. 1: 4-18.

Golden Text.—"I am He that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive for evermore."—REV. 1: 18.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Because I live, ye shall live also."—JOHN 14: 19.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Apostle John outlived all of his companions in the Apostolic company, and continued his usefulness down to very old age. He lived for about thirty years after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and has left us as, probably, the latest product of his pen, the wonderful and mysterious Revelation of Jesus Christ. This book has been at once a source of great comfort and perplexity to Christians. A blessing is pronounced upon all hearers and readers of the book, and if we are content to take the practical lessons from the midst of the imagery we may find abundant spiritual nourishment. Verses 1-3 constitute an introduction to the entire work.

THE LESSON.

I. THE INTRODUCTION TO THE VISION.—VS. 4-8.

V. 4.—"John to the seven churches which are in Asia." The number of churches to which these revelations were originally addressed was doubtless limited to seven, because that number represents completeness; and, therefore, these churches are to be regarded as the representatives of the Church universal. Those in Asia were selected in all probability because the people in those churches were intimately acquainted with John. "Grace be unto you and peace." This book begins in the epistolary form, although after the messages given, especially to these churches, that form passages into the prophetic. "From Him, which is, etc." By this expression John evidently intended to designate the Father. "And from the seven Spirits which are before His throne." This does not indicate a plurality of Spirits associated with the Father and Son in the Godhead, but refers rather to the manifold fulness of the Spirit's activity, as in the lines

> "Thou anointing Spirit art,
> Who dost Thy sevenfold gifts impart."

V. 5.—"And from Jesus Christ." His name, which usually stands second in such combinations, is placed last because the writer wished to speak more fully of Him and His work. "The faithful witness." Truthful in all that He has declared, and faithful in all that He has promised. "The first begotten of the dead." The earliest of the resurrection of all who sleep in Him. "And the prince of the kings of the earth." By subjection to the will of God, He had secured all that Satan had offered on condition of His subjection to him. From the description of the dignity of Christ, John passes directly to an ascription of praise to "Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood." After all, Christ's claims upon us are felt more vividly when we consider what He has done for us, than when we simply regard Him in His rightful dignity and power.

V. 6.—"And hath made us kings and priests." The Revised Version gives a more accurate translation of this clause, "Made us to be a kingdom, to be priests," i.e., a kingdom composed of priests whose king is Jesus. "To Him be glory and dominion forever and ever." Such an ascription of glory and dominion can be made only to God, and all such passages indicate the Apostle's belief in the divinity of Jesus.

V. 7.—"Behold, He cometh with clouds." In prophetic anticipation John looks beyond all intervening events and sees, as if near at hand, the blessed consummation when Christ shall come to judge the earth. This coming shall be before all men, for, "every eye shall see Him." His coming shall bring woe to those who have been among His enemies, for "all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him."

V. 8.—The form of this verse indicates that these words were spoken by God as an explicit message for John to record in this place, but there is nothing in the context to suggest such an oral message earlier than verse 11. "I am Alpha and Omega." The first and last letters of the alphabet of the Greek language, which John employed.

II. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE VISION.—VS. 9: 11.

V. 9.—"I, John, who also am your brother and companion." John does not arrogate to himself any titles or dignities. He is simply the brother and companion of those to whom he is writing. "In tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ." Although John escaped many dangers to which other Christians had been exposed, yet his life had been by no means free from tribulation. He, no less than Peter, had been compelled to follow in His Lord's footsteps along the doleful way of suffering. "Was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God." The well established tradition is that John was banished to Patmos during the reign of Domitian, in order to prevent him from preaching the Gospel, but this banishment gave him a more wonderful message, and a wider audience.

V. 10.—"I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day." This evidently refers to some unusually exalted spiritual condition, when heaven sees very near to the soul. "And heard behind me a great voice." This voice was that of the King in His majesty, speaking to John in order to attract his attention to what should follow.

V. 11.—"I am Alpha and Omega." Jesus here utters the same things concerning Himself that the Father was represented as saying in verse 8, "What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia." John is thus distinctly commissioned to make known the visions he was about to see to the Church universal.

III. THE VISION.—VS. 12-18.

V. 12.—"I turned to see the voice that spake with me." This, of course, was natural, not only to satisfy personal interest, but as a matter of respect to the speaker. "And having turned I saw seven golden candlesticks." In the symbolism of the Old Testament, the candlestick stood near the entrance to the holiest place. Here seven candlesticks are used to indicate the presence of Him who makes all places holy by His presence.

V. 13.—We have now a description of the personal appearance of Jesus in His glory. His form was human, for He was "like unto the Son of Man," but all the accessories of dress and appearance raised Him to a position of utmost majesty and dignity. His long garment, girded high up about the breast, indicated the repose of a victorious king.

V. 14.—"His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow." This does not indicate old age, but rather the dignified beauty which accompanies a crown of white hairs upon the brows of our friends. "His eyes were as a flame of fire." Clear, penetrating, indicative of unfailing energy.

V. 15.—"And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace." There is some doubt as to the correctness of the word brass, as representing the original term, but the ideas which we associate with this substance correspond well with the evident meaning of the entire clause, which represents Jesus as standing or walking, with feet resplendent with glory, not travel-stained as when on earth. "And his voice as the sound of many waters." Sonorous and suggestive of reserved power.

V. 16.—"And he had in his right hand seven stars." These stars represent the churches to which this message was sent, as the objects of the especial and effective care of Jesus in His glorified state. "Out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword." This represents His word penetrating the most stubborn defences of the heart, and destroying the enemies of the Lord. "His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength." The general expression of His combined features was thus clear, brilliant, and overwhelming.

V. 17.—"When I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead." This sudden vision of divine majesty and glory was too much for John and he fell senseless at the feet of his Lord. "And he laid his right hand upon me saying, Fear not." Jesus does not wish to cast down, but to lift up. "I am the first and the last." Again Jesus affirms His eternity and so claims divine prerogatives.

V. 18.—"I am he that liveth." Revision, "The living one." Having life in himself and source of all life in others. "And was dead." More literally, "became dead," i. e., gave up for a season my life. "Behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen." As His death had been voluntary, so it had been temporary, for He rose again the third day. "And have the keys of hell and of death." He not only conquered death for Himself, but for all His.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY.

1. All Scripture is profitable, and no part should be slighted.

2. God anticipates coming trials by bestowing needed grace.

3. The love of Jesus for us is an active and enduring love.

4. In His kingdom we are to both serve and rule.

5. It is by tribulation and patience that we obtain the kingdom.

6. What we learn of Jesus we should be ready to impart to others.

7. Our beloved is the chief among ten thousand.

8. He holds His people in His hand to guard and control them.

How He Found the Way.

THE spot was pretty enough. Great willows bending over the clear stream which reflected the long, graceful branches of verdure. A hillside donning the many colored garb of autumn.

But all this and even the glorious anthems of silvery-throated birds was lost upon the boy sitting on an old log with his face buried in his hands.

"It is no use," he murmured, heaving a deep sigh, which might have arisen from the over-burdened heart of a man of fifty; but it was pitiful indeed to see a boy of fifteen so much in trouble.

"I might as well give it up and content myself with the idea of being an ignoramus all my life."

Mrs. Arnold had very little of this world's goods. One acre of ground, which she and her son cultivated in the summer, gave them a scanty support and enabled them to save a few dollars to help them through the winter.

Their humble home was unfortunately just far enough from town to make it necessary for George to pay a small tuition in order to attend the public school. The tuition seemed small, but was a great deal to him and his poor widowed mother.

His greatest desire was to acquire an education which would enable him to obtain a lucrative position, that his mother's declining years might be free from toil and care.

"Mother says to pray when I reach the Red Sea, but I am about losing faith in such things," thought George with doubt and bitterness that would have been far more becoming to a hardened infidel.

Whom have I on earth beside Thee—
Whom in heaven but Thee?

A little strange that such fitting words—words too, which he had heard at Sunday-school, should have found an echo in his heart at this moment when they were most needed.

"Whom indeed have I but the great source of all help?" Down by the old log George knelt and prayed for assistance and guidance. George had not intended going to town until Saturday, but his mother answered a letter which she had been thinking about doing for several days, and George told her he would mail it, as there was no work to be done that afternoon.

As he left the post-office, Harry Jones met him and asked if he were going to start to school on Monday.

"I can't go this year," replied George.

"Can't go. Why not? We are going to have the best school this year we have ever had. A number one principal, none of your one-horse teachers like some we have had in our dark ages. Say, why don't you come?"

"I can't afford to pay the tuition."

"Why, it isn't much."

"No, it wouldn't be for you who never knew a want, but two dollars is a large amount to me. In fact it might as well be twenty. We've had a hard time since father died, four years ago."

"Well, I know of something. Come with me, and let us see father. I heard the professor ask father if he knew of a boy who would read for him at night. There is something the matter with his eyes; I believe he said the optic nerve was out of fix some way, and he wants to hire some good reader to read law to him. You know you always got the prize for reading. Well, sir, this is the best thing I ever thought of. You'll get to go to school yet, old boy."

George obtained the position without any difficulty, and gave such entire satisfaction that he received a good salary, which enabled him to pay his tuition and assist his mother also.

Years afterwards, when he had attained an exalted position in the world, he loved to tell young Christians how he had found a shining path through every Red Sea of difficulty.—Christian Advocate.

A Classic Retreat.

DeLAND, THE EDUCATIONAL CENTRE OF THE STATE.

The Academy and College.

The Founder and Patron—A Friend of Florida—The New Institutions Flourishing—The Course of Study—Faculty, Etc.—Interesting Details.

"And eastward, still, upon the last green slope
From which the Angel of the Morning Light
Leaps to the meadow lands, fair Amherst sat,
Capped by her many-windowed Colleges."

A SCORE of years hence, the old graduate of DeLand, returning to visit his Alma Mater, will look upon her stately buildings with feelings of pride, and perhaps express them in flowing numbers as rhythmical as those written on approaching a more venerable institution in the old Bay State. There is always a peculiar charm about an academic town. A stranger visiting Cambridge or Andover feels this at once; he notes the influence of culture in everything, the architecture, the manners of the people and the quiet dignity with which business is transacted. He seems to breathe a different atmosphere and the charm increases as his visit lengthens. Already these features are noticeable at DeLand, although the college is still in its infancy. It was the purpose of the founder, to establish in Florida a Christian institution which should be inferior to none in the country, but he added to his generosity remarkable foresight in the selection of the locality. The city of DeLand is in Volusia County, on the east coast of the peninsula, about 100 miles south of Jacksonville. It is accessible by both river and rail, located on high, rolling pine land, not near any water standing or running, and is remarkable for its general healthfulness. The climate is almost a specific for throat and lung troubles, catarrh, rheumatism, etc. The population numbers about 1,500 white people, and is far superior to most Northern towns of the same size in its moral and intellectual tone. There are in the city six white churches, all possessing houses of worship, a well-organized public school and a kindergarten. Three weekly papers are published in DeLand also. The general healthfulness and beauty of the city, its accessibility, together with the high character of its inhabitants, and the stimulating, intellectual, moral and religious influences make this almost for an institution of learning. It is destined to become to Florida what Cambridge is to Massachusetts, or New Haven to Connecticut, the educational centre of the State.

HON. H. A. DELAND,

DeLand Academy and College is situated about one-third of a mile north of this thriving town, and in one of the most beautiful and healthful sections in Florida.

THE MAIN BUILDING

is situated on the corner of the two principal thoroughfares of the city, Woodland Boulevard and Minnesota avenue. It presents an imposing appearance as it rests upon a beautiful and gradually rising knoll, in close proximity to the dark green orange trees laden with their golden fruit, and surrounded by the tall and stately pines. In architectual design it is one of the most handsome and best arranged buildings for educational purposes the writer has ever seen. Upon approaching the building one is ushered into a large hall with wide and easy stairs leading up to the second story from both front and rear. The ground floor contains the chapel, where the students assemble in the morning for daily prayers and worship, the recitation rooms of the grammar department, the office of the president, and the library, which holds upon its shelves hundreds of carefully selected volumes, embracing the works of all the finest authors. A large room, where those can study who prefer a desk, furnished with dictionaries, globes, charts, blackboards, etc., to use in the pursuit of knowledge, is to be found there, and also the president's recitation-room, used for recitations in the languages, and higher branches.

THE SECOND FLOOR

contains the scientific department and recitation-rooms of the same, which are supplied with an unusually fine set of instruments and appliances, giving rare opportunities to those who desire to pursue the various departments of science.

Here also are the recitation-rooms of the Preceptress, Mrs. Helen B. Webster, in addition to two large rooms devoted to the study of art. The founders of this institution, appreciating the growing interest in drawing as a necessary branch of education, and also the demand for instruction in the more advanced department of art work, have organized in connection with which instruction will be given in every kind of mechanical and industrial drawing, painting in oil and water colors, crayon and clay modeling, as well as all forms of recent decorative art work. This department is under the management of Miss Annie R. Tuthill, a full graduate of the Cooper Union Art School. The building is heated with steam, and the halls, rooms, library, chapel and recitation-rooms are all large, light and airy; a great deal of skill and method has been used in the planning and construction of the building.

THE NEW DORMITORY

which has been recently erected in close promixity to the College and is an important part of the institution, faces on Minnesota avenue, and is known also as after Mr. J. B. Stetson, who generously gave almost one-third the cost of the entire building. Upon entering the broad, spacious hall, first on the right are the parlor, reception and music-rooms, back of which is the large and cheerful dining-room; to the left of the main hall are two suites of rooms which are divided by a hall of smaller dimensions. The front suite is occupied by the President, Mr. J. F. Forbes, and his family, and the other suite by Mr. Theodore Shotwell, the steward, and his family. The building is supplied with a double stairway leading to the second story, which completely divides the apartments of the male and female students the same as if in two entirely separate buildings.

The gentlemen's and ladies' sides of the building are comfortably, even elegantly furnished; each room is 12x15 feet and has a large closet. A lovely view is obtained from this building and especially from the second and third floors, as it stands at quite an elevation above the surrounding country. The dormitory is a model of neatness, beauty and comfort.

Professor Forbes, the President of the College, is a graduate of the University of Rochester; he spent one year abroad in a German university and gymnasium, making a specialty of the French and German languages. For the past seven years he has been teacher of Latin and Greek in the New York State Normal School at Brockport, N. Y., and previous to that time had had large experience in high schools and academies. He brings to the institution ripe scholarship, long experience and a love for his work. The other members of the Faculty are instructors of experience and reputation.

DeLand College is destined to become one of the leading institutions of the South and will not only offer opportunities for education unsurpassed in the North but, by educating the sons of Florida within her own borders, will give a to the State which will be of more value to it than millions of dollars invested otherwise. The noble founder is truly a friend of Florida and generations yet unborn "will rise up and call him blessed."—Jacksonville (Fla.) Morning News of October 14th, 1886.

Catarrh Cured

Catarrh is a very prevalent disease, with distressing and offensive symptoms. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives ready relief and speedy cure, from the fact it acts through the blood, and thus reaches every part of the system.

"I suffered with catarrh fifteen years. Took Hood's Sarsaparilla and I am not troubled any with catarrh, and my general health is much better." I. W. LILLIS, Postal Clerk Chicago & St. Louis Railroad.

"I suffered with catarrh 6 or 8 years; tried many wonderful cures, inhalers, etc., spending nearly one hundred dollars without benefit. I tried Hood's Sarsaparilla, and was greatly improved." M. A. ABBEY, Worcester, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

The Youth's Companion.

The Companion has now reached a weekly circulation of nearly 400,000 copies. The position that it holds as a family paper is due to the fact that it exemplifies and exalts all that is best in life, without sacrificing the interest and vitality of the stories and articles it publishes; and while it seeks to entertain, its pages are dignified and enriched by the contributions of the most illustrious living authors.

Among the Special Contributors to the Companion for 1887 are

W. D. Howells and J. T. Trowbridge,

Prof. T. H. Huxley, The Princess Louise and Marquis of Lorne, Archdeacon Farrar, Francis Parkman, The Duke of Argyle, Louise Chandler Moulton, James Payn, and C. A. Stephens.

Free to Jan. 1, 1887.

To any one who subscribes now, and sends us $1.75, we will send the Companion FREE from the time the subscription is received to Jan. 1, 1887, and a full year from that date. This offer includes the Double Christmas Number. Remit Money Order, Check, or Registered Letter.

EX-PRESIDENT ARTHUR.—The quiet and unpretending gentleman who was laid to his rest last Monday enjoyed a singular felicity. He was the fourth man in our history who came by succession, and not by election, to the Presidential chair, and he alone gained rather than lost by the elevation. His deportment while Garfield lay on his bed struggling with the results of a ghastly wound, was all that could be desired. And from the time he entered upon the duties of the Executive, he steadily grew in public favor. His administration was able and wise and dignified. It did not please violent partisans, and of course was obnoxious to the opposite political party, but it won the confidence and approval of moderate, thinking men, and will go down into history as one of the best the country has had in times of peace. Certainly few now living will forget with how much apprehension men viewed the transition from Garfield to Arthur, and how pleasantly and surely that apprehension was removed as time disclosed the sterling qualities of the new Chief of State. A great, brave, kind heart ceased to beat when Gen. Arthur died last Thursday morning.

CHURCH UNION.—The bishops of the Episcopal Church have given to the public a basis of union for the evangelical churches of the United States, and at the same time declared their desire for a union. Would not a practical exhibition of the sincerity of this desire have a great effect? If the bishops or their clergy would exchange pulpits with the ministers of other denominations, so acknowledging other ministers to be ministers and other churches to be churches, would not the act promote Christian union? In what respect can the Episcopal ministry claim an Apostolic succession superior to that of the Reformed (Dutch) Church? The ordination of the ministry of the Reformed Church comes from the same source, comes also through a liturgical State Church, and has passed without a break, without a stain, without corruption, from generation to generation. In what respect are the Episcopal churches more in the line of Apostolic succession than the Reformed churches?

THANKSGIVING is profitable. Trials and troubles, wants, dangers, follies, weaknesses, annoy and vex, and imperiously demand attention. Men must think and think a great deal about them. They must be met, provided for, overcome or removed, for they threaten to be disastrous, often to be ruinous. In the thought and effort to master and conquer or to relieve one trial, ten mercies or a hundred will receive no attention, for they call for none, and will be overlooked and forgotten. The trouble or peril makes an impression, the mercies often make none. It is well to be called to an enumeration of our mercies, of the gifts and opportunities, the help, the deliverance, the provision for our varied wants, received from a kind and watchful Providence, and for which we have reason to be thankful. Thanksgiving day comes at a good time for such a reckoning. We are to give thanks for the mercies of the year. Thanksgiving day falls on the last week of next to the last month of the year. An intelligent estimate of the year and its results can then be made. The festival day of the last month of the year is not interferred with, nor a due observance of the first day of the following year. The call to thanksgiving comes at the proper time. Let us count up our mercies, let us set them in order over against our privations and troubles and cares. The mercies exceed in number and value and importance. We have been tested in various ways from various sources; the mercies have upheld us and enabled us to endure the testing.

It is a great privilege to be living in such a time as this, when the world is advancing with such rapidity in knowledge, in discoveries and inventions that add to the power of man, in social and political arrangements that relieve from oppressive or limiting regulations and give a larger freedom to human action, in provision for the comfort of life, in a better knowledge of and a higher regard for virtue; when benevolence is extending its beneficent sway; when the kingdom of Christ, of God, of heaven is advancing as never before. Even the sick man, and the poor man, and the obscure man ought to be thankful for life alone in such a time as this, and for the opportunity to add his push, feeble though it may be, to the car of progress.

The year to Americans has been one of anxiety because of the struggles of the wage-earners. The world has never seen strikes of workingmen so extensive, so prolonged, involving so many persons and so many interests. But we have reason to be thankful that the acts of violence have been so few, that so much regard has been paid to public opinion, that the influence of free American institutions has restrained and modified the action of men bent on working out a revolution. Where and when have tens of thousands of workingmen, striving for such an end, been so orderly, so regardful of the rights and welfare of their fellow citizens! Is not this very unrest also a condition to be thankful for? How much better it is than stagnation, or sullen submission! It is an evidence of life and energy reaching out after better conditions of life and a better life. It is not always well-informed, is sometimes mistaken, at times unjust, but will learn, will discover the right end and the right way to it. It is a part of the majestic movement which has lifted the laborer out of serfdom and made him a freeman, given him a voice in the choice of his rulers, vastly increased his knowledge and in many ways ameliorated his condition.

We have reason to be thankful for the triumphs of the faith we hold,—triumphs in ourselves, in our families, in our beloved country and over the wide world. Since the last Thanksgiving day thousands of souls in this land have been brought back to God through our Lord Jesus Christ. The last winter brought to many a new and blessed life. The Spirit of God delivered many from the bondange of sin and gave them the glorious liberty of the sons of God. What occurred here has been enjoyed also in many lands. In thousands of homes, where one year ago no altar to the true God had a place, there will be to-day praises to Him who hath loved us and bought us with His blood, and made us kings and priests unto God.

AN OLD CALUMNY.—A respectable Albany newspaper recently repeated the old charge that the good people who are solicitous about the state of the brethren abroad might better "turn their attention to the savages at home." No doubt the writer supposed he had reason for saying what he did, but he had none at all. He was simply showing his dense and inexcusable ignorance. The persons who contribute to foreign missions are the same that uphold all sorts of missionary work among "the heathen in the large cities;" and the only difference is that where one dollar is given for the former, five dollars, and sometimes ten, are given to the latter. Their charity begins at home, but it does not end there. Like the Master's, it takes in all the world and extends to every creature. It would be well for self-appointed critics of the churches to look into their working, and see whether there is any, even the least, foundation for the time-worn assertion that the followers of Christ neglect the heathen at their doors while they cross oceans and continents to carry the Gospel to the perishing millions.

A GREAT MISTAKE in evangelistic work is too much concentration in the matter of holding meetings. Take a city with a population of fifty or sixty thousand, in the midst of which some twenty or more Protestant churches are in operation, instead of securing the largest public hall available, and having a series of great, overcrowded meetings, better, more thorough and effective work can be done, and more people who need to have the Gospel taken to them reached, by having meetings in progress at the same time in different sections. Less concentration and greater diffusion of the gifts and forces of the various churches will show the best results in the matter of systematic visitation from house to house, and in securing the attendance at the meetings of non-church-goers. This is not a theory of ours; it is the testimony of careful observation and practical experience. Where it is the desire, by union evangelistic meetings, to reach every family in a city, the wise method is that adopted by the Protestant pastors and churches of Philadelphia, given in detail in this journal of November 10th. We refer to this believing it to be a good basis on which to plan a union effort.

The Spiritual Outlook.

THE last annual report on "The State of Religion," which is in the Minutes of the General Synod of 1886, presents encouraging statistics of progress during the past ecclesiastical year. There were gains over the previous year of 11 churches, 755 families, 400 members received on confession, 449 on certificate, and a net gain, over losses by dismission and death, of 3,585 communicants. There were numerous revivals and many churches received larger accessions from the world than usual. There were other items of encouraging advancement on various lines of Church work. For all such tokens of Divine favor we should be very thankful.

But the reports reveal other facts that are not so cheering. For instance: Ninety-one churches report not a single person received into their fellowship on confession of Christ! Thirty-three churches report but one, and thirty-eight report only two new communicants thus received. Some of these churches were vacant, some sent no reports and others reported the figures of the preceding year; but the most of them reported in part. Many have excellent pastors; some are very small and weak in every way; others have goodly numbers of families, communicants and Sunday-school pupils and workers. The Classis of Arcot, India, is not included in these statements, although its showing in this relation is quite as favorable as the average of our American Classes.

But here are the crucial facts for the home churches to ponder and pray over: that of our 513 American churches, more than one-fifth have not received any additions from the world during the last reported year, and that in seventy-one others the accessions by confession were only 109. That is to say further, that, while 4,549 persons were admitted to 351 of our churches, during the same period only 109 were admitted to 71 of the remaining 162 churches. Is this a satisfactory result? Ought it not to arouse the spirit of the whole Church, and set us all to thinking and feeling and praying and laboring more earnestly for the revival of God's work?

It will not do to charge the deficiency upon the sovereignty of God; nor will it mend matters to say that we are not worse off than some other churches; neither would we venture to utter one word against the good ministers and pious elders and deacons and Christian workers in these churches. Their more successful and happier co-laborers should tenderly sympathize with them, encourage and help them in every way they can.

But the question returns with painful force, which was keenly put by an eminently blessed pastor, "Is conversion becoming a lost art in the churches?" Is soul-saving less urgent than "church-saving?" Ought not pastors and their spiritual advisers and helpers, the elders and the active Christians, to give more thought and time and strength to aggressive movements upon the unconverted and unbelieving world? More people are born and more die every year in our own country than are converted to Christ; and yet the Christian Church never had great numbers, and temporal and spiritual resources; nor more open doors, nor more inspiring opportunities and powerful motives to hearty and promising evangelistic work, than she has at this very time. When conversions cease in any church and congregation, what doth hinder? When the Spirit is withheld, why is it? Is it not time for pastors and people to echo the outcry of the convicted at Pentecost, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?"

One thing we must not do: We must not settle down into fatalistic indifference and despairing dependence upon the sovereign movements of the Holy Ghost. The Comforter works directly, and by the means of grace. No promises of God's Word are greater than those which assure us of His blessings for those who ask the Holy Spirit of Him. Moreover, delays are not denials on the part of God in answering prayer for the best of gifts. And often there are unconsciously and unknown to ourselves, gracious, silent preparations for revivals in the hearts of many separate believers whose secret, isolated prayers blend into one mighty volume at the throne from whence the river of life flows down to earth. We may even now be on the eve of a "time of refreshing," for which the facts that alarm and those that encourage are the signs and heralds of the waiting Church.

O, LORD, REVIVE THY WORK.

THE DUTCH MARTYROLOGY is not a rendering mainly from the Dutch Book of Martyrs as we supposed. The Rev. Mr. Van Pelt is compiling a record from various sources and adding the observations made by himself during a visit last summer to the Netherlands. The papers we have the privilege of publishing from week to week are therefore a new statement of important annals and probably in a large measure more complete than any hitherto published. One characteristic is beyond question; they constitute the best and most comprehensive account of the Dutch martyrs to be found in English literature. Hitherto English-speaking people have had only a general knowledge of the men who suffered unto death for Christ's sake in the Netherlands, now that knowledge will become definite and particular. For such persons Mr. Van Pelt is adding a new and most valuable chapter to the history of the Church of the Reformation.

INACCURATE VERSIONS.—Some good persons have been troubled by the fact that modern criticism has shown the incorrectness of the translation of certain passages of Scripture, which yet have been of great comfort to many of God's people. An instance is Job's utterance "Though he slay me, etc." Prof. A. B. Davidson explains this on the ground that though the words are an inaccurate rendering of the original, yet they express forcibly great general truths of Scripture, or at least truths generally Scriptural. He suggests as a parallel many of the pulpit expositions heard from week to week. They are anything but exact exegeses, but they set forth in a rough and right way a meaning for which there is Biblical authority somewhere or other, and doubtless benefit many, although they give a bad quarter of an hour now and then to the unhappy few, as the saying is, di color che sanno (to those who know). He adds what is very true, that correct exegesis is one of the rarest things to meet. The reason is that the power of producing it is not a gift but an acquirement. [But is not tact at seizing the sense of a passage born with a man?] Many sermons bear witness to the brilliancy, the thoughtfulness, or even to the laboriousness in certain directions of their authors, but comparatively few give any evidence of a patient study of Scripture in its connection. This is not a bad hint to those whose habits in the matter are yet to be formed.

The Earthquake's Errand.

ONE fearful night,
As by the pillars that uphold its girth,
The King of all arose, and shook the earth
With fearful might.

As giant tree,
All shivered by a bolt from heaven's own hand,
So, shattered all, doth yon fair city stand,
Beside the sea.

In midnight hours
The south wind bears a wail of grief and pain;
The north wind answers once and once again,
"Your loss is ours."

Do they forget,
Forget, forget those years of blood and tears?
Nay, all the wrath was buried with those years,
And love is yet.

Our motherland—
She, too, puts every bitter memory by;
Her children suffer, and she hears their cry
With outstretched hand.

By earthquake shock,
The poet sings, has gold been oft revealed,
That else had lain for aye and aye concealed Beneath the rock.

It showed us, then,
That, under all, yet love may buried be,
So long and deathlessly, where none may see,
In hearts of men.

"Old Colony" Papers.

Archibald Alexander Hodge.

I RETURNED from the Harvard celebration to find Princeton in mourning, stricken as this historic seat of great and good men has seldom been. Dr. A. A. Hodge had preached in Marquand Chapel before the College students on the previous Lord's day with his usual vigor,—in fact, an authoritative critic belonging to the faculty pronounces it one of the greatest sermons he ever listened to. During that same day, perhaps due to the sudden transition from a very warm building to the raw November air, he developed a cold that fastened itself upon the kidneys (which probably must have been secretly diseased already), and he soon sank into unconsciousness, and so passed away on Thursday evening.

Princeton, I say, is stricken and in mourning. And by this I mean to imply that just now our sense of personal bereavement is uppermost in our minds and hearts. Dr. Hodge was as beloved by his neighbors and associates as he was eminent throughout the Christian world for his attainments and services. He was on the kindliest and most unconstrained terms with all, and was gentle, generous and loyal in all his relations with the local church and town and social life. His cordial and unconventional association with myself and family have been among the brightest phases of my recent experience.

He was a man of striking individuality. His appearance was peculiar. He had a square head, sandy hair and whiskers partly whitened by advancing years, the top of his head being bald with a slight furze of ineffectual hairs. His face was florid, with deepening lines and marked features—especially the "wide, loose" oratorical mouth. He was rather short and broad in figure, and walked with a swinging and even a sidelong gait. He was plain, if not "free and easy," both in his manner and attire, and yet impressed all with a sense of genuine dignity and unaffected courtesy. He was conspicuously near-sighted, and even with glasses was obliged to hold his book close to his eyes. His voice was a clear and pleasant head-tone, but not powerful or pliant, and the matter of class-room lecturing did not tend to increase its force or volume. His conversation was sprightly and humorous. He spoke his feelings and opinions with the frankness of a child, and they were apt to be eccentric and even startling in their radical and logical conservatism. He was a wide reader in all departments of literature, not excepting what is known as "light." He was, in fact, the farthest removed from a mere book-worm or "dryasdust," or the common notion of a didactic or polemic theologian of the much maligned "Calvinistic" type.

As a man and a Christian he was humble, tender-hearted, spiritually minded, and devoted to the practical and saving ends of the truth which he was set to teach. In training young men for the ministry his most essential emphasis was placed upon the personal and spiritual knowledge of Christ, and he was inexorable in opposing the entrance of all not thus qualified into the sacred office. In the very last Sunday afternoon conference with the theological students which I attended, only two weeks before his death, he turned from what was a specially intellectual theme to urge, in tones of mingled tenderness and peremptoriness, the prime importance of a spiritual equipment. His prayers were wonderful for their simplicity, unconventionality, fulness, and religious glow. Not only in his sermons but in his lectures he was unable at times to repress his emotion, especially in allusion to Jesus. With perhaps one exception, I never saw a man of learning and power who seemed to have such a depth of tenderness and personal affection towards his Saviour.

Talk about a "christocentric theology," as something which Germany and its Andover conduit are called to introduce as some "new" thing. This representative Calvinistic theologian of America, the heir of all the Calvinistic ages, literally wanted to "know nothing among men" and to teach nothing to the teachers of men "but Jesus Christ and Him crucified." He loved Jesus as a child loves his mother, he shook with emotion at the very name, and came back as constantly to the theme of the Cross as a released spring to its place. It was not a mere "historic Christ," either. It was the personal Saviour and Master, with whom he walked, and with whose grateful remembrance and communion he thrilled. Coming straight from cultured and cynical Harvard, I am peculiarly impressed with the reality and vitality and practical power of the heart-religion, the "emotional" religion, which Dr. Hodge illustrated, and which have been so evident in the services that have followed his departure. There is a tender and triumphant note about them all,—no classic eulogy of the scholar and the upright man, but the same tone which has left its traces in the catacombs where the early Church laid away its dead in the twilight of an assured resurrection morning, and the fraternal spirit which breathes through the Epistles of the beloved disciples.

Dr. Hodge was the last man to make account of small and unessential points of belief. He was as catholic and truly liberal of spirit as he was rooted and loyal to the great truths of the Word. But wherever the souls of men were in danger of being drawn aside from the explicit and uncompromising conditions of the Gospel, he was a theological watch-dog—nay, at times rose to the "burden" and the ban of a prophet. At the time of his death he was preparing a book in refutation of the Andover speculations, which would have been both a trumpet and a two-edged sword.

In his sermon at the Seminary Chapel last Lord's day morning, Dr. Patton said: "Dr. Hodge was (and in so saying I measure my words) the greatest of living teachers of theology, and one of the greatest who have ever lived." The emphasis was, of course, upon the word "teacher." He was equipped with the resources of a life-time, gathered not only from the immediate study of theology, but in scientific and literary directions. As a favorite pupil and companion of Albert Dod and Joseph Henry, he received, while still a student, a taste and aptitude for mathematics and natural science. He may almost be said to have imbibed theology in the atmosphere of his father's library and society. But his unique and unapproachable excellence was in his gift of teaching. His power of definition, clearness and statement, he shared with his illustrious father. But he added thereto a genius for "putting things," derived from a vivacity and imagination of which the latter was quite destitute.

This combination of analytic and logical power with the brilliance and fascination of the poet is almost unparalleled in the record of great theological scholars. It was not mere fancy, it was the highest order of vivifying and vitalizing imagination. As has been remarked, he placed doctrine under the illumination of a calcium light.

In point of fact, Dr. Hodge was a typical genius, both in "the eccentricities and the sublimities" of that indefinable quality. He was not as any other man, he spoke and thought and felt not as other men. He stamped his personality on every act and utterance, and lighted up and freshened all that he touched with a transfiguring power and beauty which proceeded from the originality, splendor and consecration of his manhood and intellect.

Another great, and too rare, excellence as a theologian was his inseparable association of doctrine with experience. His was emphatically a Heidelbergh rather than a Westminster type of theology. It was theology on fire, not only with the glow of imagination but with the fervors of love. He carried this same quality into the pulpit, and his lectures outside of the Seminary. And hence, though dealing with the most abstract themes, and having little or no oratorical grace or power, he was a very popular and a singularly edifying preacher. A new and wide avenue of usefulness was just opening before him in the popularization of theology. A class of Princeton ladies, a couple of years ago, induced him to give them talks on "Presbyterian doctrine." This led to a similar engagement at Philadelphia, and this winter at Orange, and calls from all parts of the country with growing crowds of hearers, including men as well as women. He could make a "dogma" as interesting and brilliant as a fairy tale. There was no end to the promise of influence and usefulness in this direction, and surely there could be no more valuable and timely mission in these unsettled times.

He had begun this kind of work at the beginning of his pastoral life, by the formation of a theological class. His "Outlines of Theology," the vade mecum of students, was the outcome of this parish instruction, and was the means of his call to his first chair of divinity. It is believed that these popular lectures had been mostly if not completely written out, and may prove a precious legacy to the Church. He wrote also a treatise on the Atonement, a Church Manual, an Exposition of the Confession of Faith, and a Life of his father. The latter is a model of biographical literature.

Dr. Hodge was only sixty-three years old. He was born in Princeton. His childhood was spent in the old Seminary mansion yonder, in which he died. He never recollected any special time when he was "born again," nor when he was not swayed by religious motives, but did not become a communicant till nineteen years of age, in which year he graduated from college. On entering the ministry he went as a missionary to India, but his health and that of his wife obliged him to return in three years, though his heart was always peculiarly in the work of heathen evangelization. Fifteen years were given to fruitful pastorates in Maryland, Virginia and Pennsylvania, and then thirteen years to his theological professorship at Allegheny,—during which latter time he was also pastor of large churches. In 1877 he was called to be the assistant of his father at Princeton, and the next year became full professor on the death of Charles Hodge.

He was one of the most influential trustees of Princeton College, and had a profound love for it, being especially concerned for its spiritual interests. It was an affecting circumstance that his last sermon was preached to the students, and his theme was the warning contained in Felix's postponement of salvation to a "more convenient season." On the previous Lord's day he preached in the Seminary chapel on the words, "Ye are complete in Him." His loss to Princeton seems irreparable. For though it is expected that Dr. Francis L. Patton will be his successor, this will be only the transfer to another chair of one who is already in the faculty.

The funeral was one of peculiar impressiveness. He was borne to the grave by his students, attended by a vast concourse of citizens, collegians, and visitors from abroad. Among the latter was a delegation from the New Brunswick Seminary, consisting of Drs. Mabon and Demarest. Dr. Paxton's address was affectionate and felicitous. Every place of business was closed, and the whole town was a silent and tearful witness of the passing of one who was a child of Princeton, its pride, its benefactor, and the friend of its humblest citizen.

Last evening as I closed my shutters and looked over to the old house at the other end of the campus, sleeping in the peaceful and heavenly moonlight, my sense of personal bereavement was lifted into thanks for such true and brilliant and potent and consecrated ones as God sends into the horizon of our lives, and awed by the marvellous serenity with which He dispenses with them when He will, that we may learn to walk in His light alone. F. N. ZABRISKIE.

PRINCETON, N. J., November 16, 1886.

Delivered November 14th, on the Fortieth Anniversary of his Settlement as Pastor of the Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I KNOW of no congregation in which minds have been more open than in this to whatever light science can give, or philosophy, or history, on the themes of chiefest interest to man. I do not think that you ever have felt that the pulpit has been narrow in its range, imperious in its tone, or averse to considering whatever the greater minds of the world have thought and taught. I have not been prodigal of historical or philosophical discussion. I have wished to present the results of thinking rather than the processes; the gathered metal, instead of the lumps of earth and stone in which it had been lodged. But it has been part of the business of my life to investigate as widely and impartially as I could whatever movements, of action or thought, have had Christian significance; and there are not many of them which have not at some time here been traced.

But nothing in all this has tended to unsettle our faith in the Gospel, or to prompt us to displace it for recent ambitious and showy speculations. On the contrary, the variety of our studies has shown us that often what has called itself light has been but a deceptive glitter born of decay; that there are temporary fashions in thought, as there are in dress or in the building of houses; that opinions which loom like the mass of continents turn out, not unfrequently, to be vanishing mists; and that even the path leading to heaven, which the Master opens, and in which the humble joyfully may walk, may be hidden, as it has been, by fantastic speculations, which one age produced and the next age forgot.

While ready, therefore, to welcome instruction from any quarter, we have not gone forth on restless quests after new theories. We prefer the old doctrine, which came with prelude of heavenly song, which He who is the Truth declared, which conquered the ancient Pagan society as sunshine conquers the fierceness of frost; which has blessed the earth wherever it has touched it as only a force from heaven could, and which comes to us commended by successions of illustrious lives, as well as by memories of fathers and mothers whose hearts it had uplifted, whose personal action it had inspired. Until the entire life of the Church has essentially failed, this faith which it has honored can no more lose the place of pre-eminence in it than the substance of the walls within which it worships can be resolved into painted glass or perishable tissues.

It is related in the memories of Bartoli, one of the distinguished Italian antiquarians, that when excavations were made at Rome on the Palatine Hill, at about the middle of the seventeenth century, under the Pontificate of Innocent X., a chamber was found lined with brilliant gold brocade, whose rich splendor almost dazzled the eye, but which faded as sunlight streamed upon it till the fascinating brilliance had entirely disappeared. An apartment near this was found lined with silver; and another, covered with sheets of lead. The silver was eagerly stripped from the walls, the lead was left. But when, after a time, the lead was removed, unsuspected riches of coined gold were found securely lodged behind and hidden by it. A fair image seems here represented of the difference between theories, which superficially attract and transiently dazzle, or schemes of opinion which have a value, but not the highest, and that mystery of the Gospel which behind a common and sober aspect conceals inestimable riches of truth and of heavenly promise.

Changes in the Churches.

The changes in Christian circles around us have been rapid, and in the aggregate sadly impressive. I think that every member of the Council by which I was installed, lay or clerical, has since passed from life on earth. Certainly of the chief clerical members —Drs. Bacon, Blagden, Spencer, Badger, Thompson, Dwight, Lansing, Adams, my father, and others—not one remains to be to-day greeted by us. Many other clergymen, then or since eminent in the city, have also entered within the gates: Drs. Cox, Lewis, Jacobus, McLane, Stone, Vinton, Cutler, Diller, W. H. Lewis, Taylor, Brodhead, Nathan Bangs, the Rev. Robert Seney, all of whom were then here, with Domine Johnson, highest of Anglicans, and most lovable of men; Drs. Bethune, Buddington, Kennedy, Rockwell, Rufus Clark, Inglis, Schenck, Elmendorf, Eells, Kimball, Dixon, with many others who came later. I am, I believe, with one honored exception, the oldest pastor in the order of settlement in active service in the same parish in any Protestant communion in New York or Brooklyn. It may not have implied special wisdom on your part to be content with one minister so long; but it shows how kindly God has dealt with us, and how genially conservative this society has been.

Brooklyn as It Was Forty Years Ago.

The changes in the outward condition of the cities, now knit by the Bridge into practical oneness, have been so many and so surprising that it seems impossible that others of like novelty and importance should occur in another such term of years. At the time of my installation, as some of you remember, we had no water in the city save that which came through the frequent street pumps or was gathered in cisterns from the roofs. New York had received it only four years before, through the then unfinished Croton Aqueduct.

We had, on this side of the river, no gas in our houses, nor along our streets; no City Hall, or municipal buildings; of course no street railways, and no telegraph connections. One struck the country road, winding between farms, at what is now the City Hall Square. The city had no uniformed police. The protection of it, so far as there was any, was in the hands of the City Watch, with two captains, two assistants, two watch-houses, and sixty watchmen, divided into squads of fifteen each, to keep guard by turns during day and night. The pay of the watchmen was fifty cents a day. There were said to be also nine invisible constables, or one for each ward. The assessed value of real and personal property in the city was $26,933,616, or considerably less than that of the real estate only in the First Ward to-day.

The square on which this church was erected was occupied, for the larger part, as a pasture for cows. What is now Prospect Park was a rough, dreary, malarious waste, with a few shanties for colored people hidden among its intricate thickets. The bridge which connects us with Manhattan Island, with its nightly crown of electric lights, would have seemed more incredible, if anyone had dreamed of it, than a vision of angels flaming forth upon the sky. Brooklyn was only known to the country, and was principally known within itself, as offering a dormitory to the people of New York, and as the last considerable place on the way to Greenwood.

Across the river the changes have been yet more conspicuous. Castle Garden was then a place for great musical performances. Stately residences stood around the Battery or overlooked the Bowling Green. Columbia College was on the old site, between Barclay and Murray streets, and its ancient sycamores had not disappeared. Trinity Church had been recently erected. The Brick Church stood on what is now known as Printing House Square. St. George's was on Beekman street, at the corner of Cliff, and had attached parishioners in Brooklyn. The Tabernacle Church was on Broadway, between Anthony, now known as Worth street, and Leonard. The New York Hospital was a little below it, on the corner of Duane street. Dr. Macaulay was preaching in Murray street, Dr. James Alexander in Duane street, Dr. Adams in Broome, Dr. Patton in Spring street.

Vast Strides in the United States.

The changes occurring in the country at large, in the same term of years, have been proportionately vast, and some of them of a deeper moral significance. When I stood in this pulpit on the stormy evening of November 19, 1846, Mr. James K. Polk was in the second year of his Presidency.

The war with Mexico had begun, but the battles of Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo had not been fought, nor Vera Cruz surrendered to our arms. It was still ten months before our troops entered the Capital. The Oregon Treaty with Great Britain had been lately negotiated, but gold had not been found in California, nor was there any hint in the air of the vast immigration which was soon to send an adventurous nation over the continent to build a new empire along the Pacific.

The first line of telegraph between Washington and Baltimore had been in operation for two years, but the novel invention was rather the wonder and the luxury of the few than the instrument of the many, and hardly the faintest prophecy had been given of the half-million miles of wire along which the messages of eager millions now incessantly pass. The oceanic telegraph was no more imagined than would have been an instrument for conversing with the stars. The Erie Railroad was not opened; nor that on the banks of the Hudson River; nor that between New Haven and New York. Less than five thousand miles of railway track had been laid in the country, as against the more than a hundred and thirty thousand miles now built and operated. An honored Congregational minister going to Oregon the year after I came here, had to take eight months for the journey. He returned some years since in less than a week; and now he can speak from the same point to friends in this city, over the telegraph, more quickly than we can send a messenger to upper New York. The National Union included twenty-nine States, instead of the thirty-eight of to-day.

It was years, of course, before slavery and freedom met in their fierce grapple in Kansas; fourteen years before the election of Lincoln; more than eighteen before the close of the Rebellion, with the resulting destruction of slavery. The nation has been essentially re-made since this pastorate began, in larger proportions, on a nobler and securer plan; the empty spaces of its immense territories have been largely occupied with villages and cities; its population has been multiplied from twenty to more than sixty millions; the moral and political life which pervades it has been vastly enriched in power and promise; its place in the world, with its influence over the peoples of mankind has been signally exalted. Others coming after us will no doubt see changes following these, of constant importance, and of secular interest. It seems impossible that they should see changes more radical or more rapid than we have witnessed, or more thoroughly alive with prophetic signs.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

A New Church Dedicated.

THE week before last was an eventful one in the history of the Classis of Schoharie. On Wednesday evening, Nov. 10th, the new Reformed church at Cobleskill was dedicated. The building was crowded with an interested congregation. Rev. W. R. Davis, D.D., of Albany, preached the dedicatory sermon. It was most helpful and inspiring, and was delivered with characteristic earnestness. Rev. J. G. Smart, of Schoharie, President of Classis, brought words of congratulation and good cheer.

The church is a neat, commodious, substantial building. It will comfortably accommodate five hundred and fifty people. The total valuation of the property is $7,600. The indebtedness, after the $1,000 pledged by the churches is received, will be $2,300.

After holding services in a public hall for sixteen months, the people were prepared to enter their own church home with gratitude and joy. It is earnestly hoped that none of the churches which have pledged their Church Building Fund collections to this church may divert their offerings elsewhere, since the money is very much needed.

On Thursday, Nov. 11th, the first Missionary Conference of the Classis of Schoharie was held at Schoharie. Mrs. D. K. Bartlett, of Albany, addressed the woman's meeting with great acceptance. Rev. W. R. Davis, D.D., delivered a very convincing and stimulating address on Foreign Missions, enlisting the closest attention. Rev. J. W. Beardslee, D.D., of West Troy, addressed the Conference on Home Missions. By means of charts the work of the Church was very clearly and instructively shown. Rev. E. S. Booth gave a sketch of the march of missions in Japan. Delegates from eight churches were present at the Conference. Resolutions were passed heartily endorsing the apportionments of both the Home and Foreign Missionary Boards.

The Conference was so profitable, so heartily enjoyed, that arrangements will be made for another during the course of the winter or early next spring.

A Golden Opportunity.

WE are all constantly surrounded with opportunities for doing good, and many, alas! we allow to slip by which will never again return to us. Especially are the opportunities many and great of those stewards of God whom He has blessed with worldly means. By their generous deeds they can extend their usefulness far beyond the limits of this brief life, and continue to speak though dead. Such thoughts as these filled my mind when I recently visited the city of Rochester and looked in upon the Second Reformed Church of that city, and witnessed its hopeful beginnings. I was never more anxious to be rich than I was that day.

Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER may know comparatively little about this new enterprise. The church was organized about three months ago. It is an English-speaking church, an offshoot of the parent church, where the Holland language is almost exclusively used. For years past, many of the young Hollanders, as they became Americanized, would naturally drop into the American churches. There is, perhaps, no church in the city which has not some of the sons and daughters of the Reformed Church. Some count them by the scores. But what is much more to be regretted is the fact that many, as they became Americanized, drifted away from church influences altogether.

For a long time Rev. P. de Bruyn, the earnest and devoted pastor of the First Church, felt the need of an American Reformed Church, and, through his wise and persevering efforts, this new organization has sprung into existence.

The new church, which worships in a rented chapel, is gradually growing and gathering to its services scores of young Hollanders. It was a most interesting sight, last Sabbath evening, to see, in spite of the disagreeable weather, more than three hundred of them present, who literally packed the chapel.

This church is largely composed of young men and women thoroughly Americanized, quite intelligent and full of energy and enterprise, and they are bound to succeed. They very much need a church edifice in the central part of the city. If they can have that, the day is not far distant when this will be a strong, self-sustaining church. The great obstacle in their way is to secure sufficient means to build such a church or chapel. They are not poor, but by no means financially strong, and unless they receive aid the danger is that they will not lay such broad and deep foundations for a strong church in the future as ought to be laid. Everywhere we see memorial churches. What a grand thing it would be if some of the friends of the Reformed Church would give them from $5,000 to $10,000 wherewith to build a neat and comfortable chapel in some central locality. No money could be better invested just now. Let all those in the East who are interested in the growth of the Reformed Church and in the evangelization of our cities, and who have something to give towards these objects, investigate this encouraging enterprise and help it along, lest for want of means the people may be obliged to put up an insignificant building on some back street, and thus imperil their future growth and success.

A VISITOR.

....JERSEY CITY, N. J.—The Sunday-school of the Lafayette Church held its twenty-fifth anniversary Sunday evening, Nov. 14th, with an overcrowded church listening to singing and addresses for two hours. The pulpit was adorned with rare flowers, and the old banner of 1861 hung on the wall. Excellent speeches were made by Mr. John Van Horne, Richard Van Dien and R. W. Woodward, all of whom had been connected with the school, the first speaker having occupied the post of the first superintendent. The present superintendent, Mr. T. P. Sherwood, gave a most encouraging report, and the pastor, Rev. Dr. W. R. Duryee, addressed a few words congratulating the school on its efficiency. A "silver wedding" collection was taken at the close, and thirty-five dollars was sent as the result to the Board of Foreign Missions, and the same amount to the Board of Domestic Missions.

....MIDDLEBURGH, N. Y.—The anniversary of the Ladies' Missionary Society connected with the Reformed Church took place on Sunday evening, Nov. 14th, at the church. The ladies conducted the meeting. Mrs. D. Beekman, Vice-President of the Society, presided; Mrs. Catharine Borst offered prayer; Mrs. Geo. L. Danforth presented a full and excellently arranged report of the late Missionary Convention at Schoharie; the Secretary, Miss Cornelia Bouck, gave a concise statement of the work of the Society during the year, and the Treasurer, Miss Maggie Scribner, presented her report, to the effect that the Society has collected during the year $77.80 and disbursed for the work of missions $73.30.

Addresses were made by Mrs. Catharine Borst, a mother in Israel nearly ninety years of age, yet possessing the faculties of her mind almost unimpaired, and by the pastor, Rev. D. K. Van Doren. Miss Eva Lay and Miss Maggie Swart gave recitations in their usually excellent manner. The choir and Sabbath-school furnished the music. The anniversary was a complete success. The Society now numbers fifty members.

....THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION met at the Synod's Rooms, 34 Vesey street, last Monday morning, and listened to a very scholarly and instructive paper on "Practical and Ecclesiastical Safeguards of Christian Doctrine," by the Rev. W. J. R. Taylor, D.D. Next Monday, Nov. 29th, the subject for discussion will be "Scriptural Relation between Employer and Employed," introduced by a paper on that subject from the Rev. George Seibert. All ministers of the Reformed Church are cordially invited to attend.

....NYACK, N. Y.—The installation of the Rev. John C. Van Deventer as pastor of the Reformed Church took place on Wednesday evening, Nov. 17th. The sermon was preached by Rev. W. V. V. Mabon, D.D., of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, on Isa. 52:7: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth!"

The pastor of the Reformed Church of Clarkstown, as President of the Classis, presided and read the form of installation. Among those present were the pastors of the Presbyterian, the Methodist, and the Baptist churches of Nyack; also several ministers of the Reformed Church, some of whom assisted in the services.

The pulpit was tastefully decorated with plants and flowers. Notwithstanding the unpleasant weather, the congregation was well represented. Brother Van Deventer enters upon a pleasant and successful pastorate—such is our belief, and such our prayer.

In Memoriam.

AT a meeting of the Board of Domestic Missions held November 15th, 1886, the following minute was adopted:

Whereas, It has pleased the Great Head of the Church to remove two members of this Board by death, viz., the Rev. Abraham Thompson in the month of September, and the Rev. Edward W. Bentley, D.D., in the month of October; and

Whereas, These brethren beloved have been associated with us for so many years in the duties and responsibilities connected with this department of the Lord's work, and have endeared themselves to us by their faithfulness, intelligence and consecration to the best interests of those in whose behalf they labored; therefore

Resolved, 1. That we, the members of the Board of Domestic Missions, hereby place upon our records our deep appreciation of the piety, fidelity and wisdom of the brethren whom God has called to the Church triumphant.

2. That we bow with chastened submission to the inscrutable Providence of God which has laid aside, so early in life, men so peculiarly fitted by natural gifts and eminent attainments for the duties to which they brought such large experience and such consecrated wisdom.

3. That their long and faithful service in this Board, their interest in its success, and their helpfulness in accomplishing its work, have given them a cherished place in our memories.

4. That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the respective families of our deceased brethren, and that they be published in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

By order of the Board, J. WEST, Cor. Sec.

Rev. Peter J. Quick.

AT a meeting of the General Synod's Standing Committee on Seminary Grounds and Property, held in New Brunswick, N. J., November 17th, 1886, it was Resolved, That we place on record our appreciation of the character of Rev. Peter J. Quick as a gentleman, a Christian and a minister of the Lord Jesus Christ, and also of his faithful service to the Theological Seminary for many years as rector of Peter Hertzog Hall and subsequently as librarian of the Gardner A. Sage Library.

Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent by the Secretary to the bereaved family with whom we sympathize in their affliction, and that a copy of the same be sent to THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER for publication.

G. H. WHEELER, Secretary.

....THE CLASSIS OF GENEVA at a special meeting held at East Williamson, November 12th, dissolved the pastoral relation subsisting between the Rev. J. W. Te Winkle and the Reformed Church of that place. Brother Te Winkle, having received and accepted a call from the Reformed church at Alto, Wis., he was dismissed to the Classis Wisconsin. Classis expressed their regret in parting with this good brother, but acquiesced in what seemed to be the will of Divine Providence. Supplies were voted to the church thus made vacant.

A call from the Church of Marion upon the Rev. W. E. Nies was approved by Classis conditionally. The Rev. P. De Bruyn was chosen Treasurer of the Wayne County missionary work in the place of Brother Te Winkle.

J. WHITBECK, Stated Clerk.

....REV. J. CHAMBERLAIN, D.D.—By advice of physicians it becomes a painful necessity to cancel all the engagements entered into for addresses by Dr. Chamberlain. The effect of his too great labors in the churches has been such that a season of rest is imperatively demanded. It is somewhat doubtful, if he is to return to India, whether he will be able to meet any further the desires of those in this country who wish to hear him.

....A MISSIONARY PAMPHLET.—The sketch of the Arcot Mission, prepared by Rev. J. H. Wyckoff, has been translated into Dutch by Rev. T. J. Kommers, and is now published in that language by the Board of Foreign Missions. A map of the Arcot Mission accompanies the sketch. It is an exceedingly valuable tract. Copies for distribution among the Holland churches can be had on application to the Corresponding Secretary of the Board.

....COLT'S NECK, N. J.—Rev. Isaac Brokaw, of Freehold, N. J., on Tuesday evening, November 9th, delivered to a large and appreciative audience in the Reformed Church, his deservedly popular lecture entitled, "Summer Sights Over the Sea." The Ladies' Aid Society of the church, for whose benefit it was given, netted a handsome sum from the proceeds of the entertainment.

....COREANS.—There are nine Coreans now in the United States. Three are in California, three in Washington, one at Lincoln University in Pennsylvania, one at Wilkesbarre, Pa., and one at Millstone, N. J. The latter is Pom Kwang Soh. He was Secretary of the Corean Embassy to the United States in 1883. He recently united with Dr. Corwin's church at Millstone. He is preparing for college. The one at Wilkesbarre, Phil Jah Soh, united with Dr. John B. Thompson's church at Berkeley, Cal., about a year ago. He is also preparing for college. These young gentlemen are eager seekers after truth, and may become a power for God in their native land.

....LENNOX, DAKOTA.—The First Reformed Church called Rev. Dr. C. F. A. Klein, who arrived here October 15th. The congregation has a good house of worship and parsonage, and the future is promising. Sunday, November 14th, the Lord's Supper was celebrated. One member was received on confession of faith. The church has been decorated by a new carpet in the aisles and on the platform. The pulpit also has received a new covering. All this was the gift of Mrs. Meyer, the wife of one of the elders. The people live miles away from the church, but, notwithstanding, the attendance has been good, and we hope that God may give us growth and blessing.

....ROCHESTER, N. Y. — The Second Church, recently organized, has called the Rev. Evart Van Derhart, a successful pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Jackson, Mich.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Pella, Neb., has called Rev. E. Westing, of Otley, Iowa.... The new church building of the Fifth Church of Grand Rapids, Mich., is completed and will be dedicated on Thanksgiving Day, in the afternoon. According to the programme all the pastors of the Reformed churches in the city will be present and take part in the services. It is expected that the following ministers will also be present: Rev. N. H. Dosker of Kalamazoo, Rev. W. P. DeJong of Grandville, and Rev. H. E. Dosker of the Western Theological Seminary. A good time is expected.

Gleanings from Our Exchanges.

....A Missionary Conference was held last week Wednesday in the Second Church of Somerville, N. J., under the auspices of the Classis of Raritan. The severe storm prevented a large attendance. The Rev. J. P. Searle, President of Classis, presided. Addresses, highly praised by the local press, were made by the Rev. Dr. C. L. Wells of Flatbush, L. I., Rev. James F. Riggs of Bergen Point, N. J., and Mrs. Horton, Chairman of the Woman's Executive Board.

....The Rev. George W. Scarlett was installed pastor of the church at Pottersville, N. J., on Tuesday, Nov. 16. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. L. McNair of Bedminster.

....The Rev. John Smit preached his farewell sermon as the pastor of the church at Wortendyke, N. J., on Sunday, Nov. 14th. He had occupied the pulpit for more than five years, and received into the membership 200 persons, and baptized 138 children. The consistory have sent to Holland for Domine Diephnis to succeed Mr. Smit.

....The church at Asbury Park, N. J., has voted a call to the Rev. D. C. Preyer of Newark, N. J.

....Local journals report that the Rev. Dr. E. A. Reed, recently pastor of the Madison Avenue Church of this city, has received a call from the First Church of New Brunswick, N. J., and is expected to accept it; also that he has a call from the Holyoke Congregational Church, Mass. It is also reported that the Rev. Robt. H. Barr of the Bushwick Church and Rev. W. H. De Hart of Jamaica, L. I., have given notice of their intention to resign the pastorates they now hold.

City Charities.

WHEN last week's number of the INTELLIGENCER had been mailed, notice was received from the American Female Guardian Society and Home for the Friendless that on Thanksgiving Day, to-morrow, a reception will be given at the Home, 32 East 30th street, and a dinner to several hundred children; that at 2.30 in the afternoon and 7.30 in the evening there are to be public exercises, in which the pupils will be the chief entertainers. For a number of our readers this announcement will prove too late. But the ladies of the Society intend to provide dinners through the week at the twelve Industrial Schools under their care. This calls for provision for some thousands of children and the ladies ask for help in contributions of money, or "poultry and meats, cooked or uncooked, vegetables and apples, pies and cakes." It will be wise to add to the attractions of these schools, to give the children a good Thanksgiving dinner, and, to add to the popularity of the large and useful and blessed work the ladies are doing. There are 5,000 children in the Christian Home and schools—children of the poor, of the toiling masses, who are in supreme need of elevating and saving influences. "Garments of all kinds," the Managers say, "and shoes for the children are also needed. Goods will be promptly sent for if we are notified when and where to send." For 52 years this society has been caring for the homeless and poor and suffering of this city. It has rescued thousands from a life of degradation and vice. Many of the noblest Christian women of the city have given to it time and thought and work and money and prayer. It is one of the best charities in the city in every sense, and deserves a hearty and generous support. The Advocate and Family Guardian, now in its 52d volume, is published twice a month, tells about the work of the society, and contains also pages of the best religious reading and is noted for delightful poetry, and costs $1 a year. Address or send gifts and communications to: Home for the Friendless, 29 East 29th street or 32 East 30th street, to Mrs. Sarah A. Stone.

The Prison Association of New York, another of our best charities, sends to us this appeal:

"The winter is coming on and the pressure upon the Prison Association is greater than at any other time. We need clothes for well-intentioned ex-convicts seeking work. We need books for the jails, where the people are keeping 1,800 people in enforced and demoralizing idleness. We need money to rescue young criminals and send them to honest homes. We need money to help crime-stricken families. We have no means of support in our work except in so far as the public sees fit to make us its almoners. Will you not give publicity to this note or its substance, and greatly oblige,

"Yours very truly,

WM. M. F. ROUND, Cor. Sec.,
65 Bible House, New York."

The General Outlook.

....There has been a remarkable work of grace in Tuskaloosa, Ala., for several weeks past. It has pervaded the entire city; the churches have been constantly crowded; stores and even saloons closed early in the evenings with a view to the night services. The oldest residents affirm that such religious interest was never seen there before. There have been about 250 professed conversions—the large proportion being young men. Seventy-six have joined the Methodist Church, thirty-seven the Presbyterian, a goodly number the Baptist, and some the Episcopal.

....At the eighth Synod of the Old Catholics in Austria, it was resolved to request the British and Foreign Bible Society to supply the body with Bibles.

....The Convention of the United Presbyterian Church recently held at Pittsburgh, Pa., adopted this: "Believing instrumental music in connection with the worship of God to be without the authority of divine appointment under the New Testament dispensation, and therefore a corruption of that worship, it is our duty to refuse in any way to countenance or support its use. And we hereby counsel all our brethren to stand firm and not defile or wound their consciences by any compliance with that which is contrary to conscience, or in regard to which conscience is not clear.

....The Church of Scotland Foreign Mission Committee report that "their missions are inadequately supported and farther retrenchment seems imminent, though the Church has ample resources. Fifty thousand of their communicants get no chance to give because the cause is not presented in their churches. Two hundred and fifty parishes with over 125,000 communicants gave last year less than $2,000. The giving and interest in missions is confined to the few."

....An "anti-clerical" meeting has been held recently in Turin, Italy, attended by 6,000 persons, many eminent men being among them. Senator Fabretti proposed that as a reconciliation with the Vatican was impossible, an attempt should be made to form a devout body of clergy, Christian rather than Roman Catholic, who should be patriotic as well as pious. The necessity for a national Italian Church was felt, especially since the restoration of the Jesuits. A similar movement has begun at Milan. There a series of conferences will be held, at which members of parliament, lawyers, students, and ministers of various denominations will be invited to speak against the Jesuits.

....A number of young Lutherans in St. Louis have set out to secure funds and erect a statue of Martin Luther in front of their seminary in that city.

....During the past twelve months, 29 German Baptist churches have been recognized, and 26 meeting-houses dedicated. The present number of churches is 161; membership, 13,000. There are 55 on the home field, assisted by the American Baptist Home Missionary Society.

....The Advance reports that at the Monday morning meeting of the Congregational pastors of Chicago, on Nov. 15th: "Rev. W. H. Aubrey, LL.D., of London, England, spoke at the Ministers' Meeting on Congregationalism in England. His address was replete with information not only bearing on the Nonconformists but also the Established churches. The Independent churches have made decided progress in battling with the State churches, as attested by the removal of old-time grievances, such as levying church rates, refusing burial on Episcopal ground and closing university doors to any but State church students. The Elementary Education Act of 1870 was a further concession to the Independents. He reported Congregationalism to be dealing with practical subjects and as maintaining its grip upon the masses. Where a decline has been experienced it is in rural districts and due largely to the removal of the young people to the manufacturing and commercial centres. Second probation theories have been current there, and have borne their fruit. Younger business men say that if the new theories are true, they fail to see the urgency of missionary labor. Already the influence of their views has been heard from at the treasury of the London Home Missionary Society. The number of ministers holding the new theory is but a small minority, but their views have tended to paralyze missionary zeal. He reports the old evangelical party in the Established Church as dying out, and the Sacramentarian part as growing rapidly. This wing of the church with its priestly assumptions, with is ornate service attracting the ignorant, begins to feel the chains in its own order. With this High Church demanding more Roman Catholic rites, and the Nonconformists demanding less, it would seem as though disestablishment might be hastened."

....Colonel Robert Lincoln has presented to the Lincoln Memorial Protestant Episcopal Church of Chicago, President Lincoln's Bible, which he frequently read while in the White House.

....The Ninth General Convention of the Sunday-schools of Kings County, L. I., was held Thursday, Nov. 18th, in the Simpson Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn. The sessions were largely attended, and much interest and enthusiasm manifested. The Secretary, John R. Morris, read a report showing 265 schools in the county, with 10,272 teachers and 86,387 scholars. Ten schools have over 1,000 members each. During the three sessions there were a number of excellent addresses delivered by different clergymen and lay workers on topics related to the Sunday-school work

....The Chicago Avenue Church, better known as "Moody's Church," corner Chicago and La Salle avenues, Chicago, was destroyed by fire a few days ago. It is believed to be the result of incendiarism. The Society was organized by Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist, in 1869, and occupied a small building until the great fire in 1871, after which the edifice just burned was erected, Mr. Moody soliciting and receiving contributions from all parts of the globe until $100,000 were secured for the purpose. Since then $25,000 have been expended in improvements. The auditorium was the largest in Chicago.

....The Rev. Dr. J. L. Withrow, of Boston, has accepted the call from the Third Presbyterian Church of Chicago.

Thanksgiving Day.

THE table groans with dainty cheer,
The glad Thanksgiving-time is here.
From far and wide are gathered in
The dear home circle, kith and kin;
Strong, lusty manhood, children gay,
And reverend age with locks of gray,
All mingle in the merry rout—
The roof the echoes back reshout.
The queen of this fair feast the while,
Is grandmamma; the placid smile
That lights her soft but wrinkled face,
Informs it with a tender grace.
The prattling infant with delight
Unfolds its treasures in her sight,
And laughs and crows with baby might.

What tempting viands greet the eyes,
What savory odors float and rise!
What sparkling crystal, shining ware,
What snowy napery spread with care!
Each voice is hushed, and bowed each he
In reverent tones the grace is said.
Then, voices gay, keep time and tune
To clash of knife and fork and spoon.
Perchance a sweet remembrance there
Of one who filled the vacant chair,
Steals with a softened, sad regret,
O'er hearts that never can forget.

O Time! great healer, still thou art
Of earth-born sorrow, earth-born smart!
A softening veil thy hand doth fling,
As ivy on some ruined thing,
Hiding its scars, doth greenly cling.
The sharpest pain, the wild regret,
May feel thy healing influence yet,
And faith and hope exultant spring,
When grief hath lost its keenest sting.

Now sets with orient pomp the sun;
The glad Thanksgiving day is done.
Night, with its shadows wan and gray,
Shuts out the golden light of day.
It minds us of some fairer clime
Beyond the reach of change or time,
Where tears nor partings e'er can come,
Yon bright, eternal harvest-home! E. V. S.

Nathan's Children.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

OLD Nathan Whiting was a stubborn, quarrelsome man. As he was never willing to yield a point nor to admit that he might possibly be in the wrong, he was constantly at variance with his neighbors and perpetually engaged in law suits. At last, in disgust with mankind, he retired from active life and built a house in a spot so secluded that he could not even see the chimney tops of his neighbors, or hear any sound of human life. In course of time death came to put an end to his law suits and to summon him before the great Judge of all the earth. Then the retirement and seclusion which had been so soothing to the irascible and irritable old man, came to be rather oppressive to the two daughters who were left alone in the house.

Miss Lois and Miss Eunice, who were now what people call "well on in years," had always felt it to be their duty, in loyalty to their father, to uphold him in his various quarrels and to insist upon the justice of his claims; at least Miss Lois always did; Miss Eunice was only a weak echo of her stronger-minded sister. For this reason they had gradually alienated from themselves the friends and acquaintances who might have made life pleasanter, and they were left to a solitude which was monotonous and dreary indeed. Had not old Becky, who had ruled their kitchen for years, run down from time to time to the little town, half a mile off, for a bit of gossip to be retailed at home, the days would have gone by slowly to poor Miss Eunice; Miss Lois would have scorned to recognize the need of any such method of beguiling time.

Miss Lois and Miss Eunice had not always been the only inmates with their father in this house. The oldest of the family, Miss Priscilla, had inherited her father's temper to an extent that made life uncomfortable to both so long as they were domiciled together. But Miss Priscilla took a step which settled the difficulty by running off and marrying what her father called "a patent-medicine chap." Father and daughter ceased to annoy and worry each other when separated, and as the "patent-medicine chap" grew rich, the father would probably have been entirely reconciled had not her marriage broken up another of his plans. He had intended that Priscilla should marry Nathan, his nephew and namesake, whom he had taken into his family for that purpose. But neither of the young people had favored the arrangement. When Nathan went off and married a girl in a neighboring town and settled there in business, his [illegible] nounced his course as if he had been guilty of some crime, and utterly forbade any intercourse between the families.

Mrs. Priscilla never felt it to be her duty to make life pleasant to her sisters, and after their father's death she only seemed to come often enough to keep up the old family feuds between herself and her former neighbors; to rekindle their old prejudices which might otherwise have died out; and to keep alive the false notion that it was disloyalty to their father's memory to encourage any reciprocal interchange of civility with those who had had part in his many quarrels.

Thus the lonely winters and long summers brought to these now middle-aged ladies very little to make life pleasant. Under such limitations Miss Lois grew cold, harsh and exacting; Miss Eunice peevish and weak.

It happened one afternoon in the early autumn that, with the intention of visiting her neighbors, but ostensibly to do an errand at the country store, old Becky threw her shawl over her head and went down to the adjoining town, putting the key of the kitchen door in her pocket, as she always did when she sallied out on an errand, as if she liked herself to command the entrance to her fortress.

The store and the post-office were under one roof and when, with her parcels the postmaster put a letter to the ladies in her hand, Becky's curiosity was aroused, especially as the letter was not in the only handwriting that ever came to them, that of Mrs. Priscilla.

With all the importance of a messenger bringing unexpected news, Becky hurried home to give the letter to Miss Lois. It proved to be an announcement of the death of Nathan, their cousin. That day there was an unusual stir in the household, for Mrs. Priscilla soon appeared upon the scene, she having received a similar announcement.

Miss Eunice wanted to take the next day's stage and be present at the funeral. She felt it her duty to visit and console the widow in her affliction. Mrs. Priscilla insisted upon it that there was no duty of that kind expected. On the contrary, that it would be acting in direct disobedience to the will of their father to do so. Miss Lois did not agree with her older sister as to the stern and unrelenting silence which should be maintained towards the family of Nathan, but she could not, on the other hand, so far compromise their father's opinions as to receive the "widow's advances," as she was pleased to call the letter. She would take a medium course, she would write a formal letter of condolence; which she did, and the breach was the rather widened thereby and the widow was left to maintain her children as best she might.

How strange it is that, with all Christ's teaching of love and good-will, there should still remain so much strife and enmity among men in this Christian land! We yield so little, we require so much of each other!

Another lonely winter and long monotonous summer passed, and during all this time Mrs. Priscilla did not come near her sisters. Away from her influence, Miss Lois seemed to be growing more kind and gentle. She did not check Miss Eunice's tender-hearted regrets as to Nathan's death, nor her pitying surmises as to how the widow managed to support the children. Even Becky noticed that she made no objection when Miss Eunice offered to write and make some inquiries about the family.

The letter was written but never mailed. As Becky was about to go to the post-office she was met by a messenger who came to make the announcement that Nathan's widow was dead and, as she was without near relatives, the lawyer had sent to her husband's family to know what was to be done about the children.

Was it the lawyer's admission of her standing as the representative head of the family, or had there been in Miss Lois' mind some misgiving as to the justness of her former decision in regard to Nathan's family that now influenced her? Perhaps it may have been the indignant protest of old Becky that she should not send her own kin to the poor-house that decided her, or perhaps all these combined actuated Miss Lois when, to the astonishment of Miss Eunice and Becky, she promptly replied to the lawyer's messenger that, as the children were without relatives on their mother's side, they were, of course, to be supported by their father's family; that she should make all arrangements for the widow's funeral and for settling up their affairs, and that then the children should come at once to her.

Miss Eunice listened in open-eyed wonder, and that night when Miss Lois had gone to her room, she slipped into the kitchen to talk over the news with Becky.

"Six children! Who'd ever think Lois'd let them come! The oldest is hardly twelve and the youngest but three! Dear me, how nice! D'ye think she'll let them romp in the parlor, Becky?"

"Bless yer, no, Miss Eunice, you musn't expect too much! they'll be welcome here in the kitchen when they want to romp. It'll be all the more lively for me!"

And kind-hearted Eunice went to bed in a happy frame of mind in anticipation of six children frolicking in the kitchen. She dreamed all night of cuddling up little three-year-old, and of teaching the older ones to read and spell.

This decided step of Miss Lois was not taken, however, without some misgiving as to what Mrs. Priscilla would say. Mrs. Priscilla said a great deal; but for once Miss Lois withstood all her arguments and defied her power. Miss Lois had the right to do as she pleased in her own house and with her own share of her father's property. The house had been left to herself and Eunice, and they had decided to admit Nathan's children.

Seeing that she was powerless to move either of her sisters, Mrs. Priscilla declared that she would leave them to their fate and never again visit under their roof.

Their fate did not appear to be a dreadful one. This decision of Miss Lois proved to be a key to unlock the secret chambers of a heart that was really full of love and kindness. Now that she had assumed the guardianship of the children, all the powers of her mind and heart were enlisted in their service. She was no longer absorbed in herself, and life opened before her with new interests and unaccustomed work that made it seem worth living.

That is an unnatural life which is cut off from all that is young and happy. To be isolated, to stand apart from family ties, produces a slow decay of the affections and selfishness comes like moral death to benumb our powers.

Nathan's children came, and Miss Lois never regretted their coming. They had a softening, humanizing effect on this lonely household. They were not troublesome, but as healthy children in ordinary life are—lively, full of fun, eager and often noisy. But they had been trained by a good mother to be obedient, and so they were easily controlled. They had been accustomed to go regularly to church and Sunday-school, to prayer-meeting and to day school, and so Miss Lois continued their attendance. and this seemed to connect these two elderly women with the village interests from which they had been so long cut off. They liked the novelty of it and the sort of importance it gave them. When the schoolmaster called to consult Miss Lois about the studies she wished the children to pursue, she felt flattered by it, and had a sort of maternal pride in hearing that they were bright and well-behaved children. When in their boisterous out-door games they tore their clothes, Miss Lois, instead of expressing vexation, was even flattered by the deference paid to her by their explanations and apologies, and by their coming to her as naturally as if she had been their mother.

As for Miss Eunice, gentle and affectionate as she was, she found constant delight in watching them at their play, in assisting Becky in making cookies and turnovers for their dinner baskets, and in amusing the little one who took at once to her kind attentions and installed himself as her especial protege.

There seemed to be an awakening of the maternal instinct in these two lonely women, and all life was changed and brightened. It was as when the May sunlight brings forth flowers from a soil in which, we thought, no good seed had been planted.

Mrs. Priscilla had prophesied a harvest of thorny regrets from her sisters' course, but acts of unselfish kindness do not bring forth a crop of nettles.

When their first Thanksgiving dinner was taken together, Miss Lois at the head and Miss Eunice at the foot of the table, with the six rosy faces between them, remembering their former silent meals, there went up from the hearts of the two sisters most earnest thanksgiving for the presence of Nathan's children.

Our Disabled Ministers.

BY THE REV. N. I. M. BOGERT.

THE writer was appointed by his Classis to report on the Disabled Ministers' Fund. In preparing his report he gathered information which aroused in his own heart an interest never before felt in this Fund. The Classis, upon hearing the report, requested that, "so far as of general interest beyond the bounds of the Classis," it be published in the INTELLIGENCER. It is hoped that the facts given may not only enlist the sympathies of the laity but also furnish to some data for pulpit appeals in behalf of a most worthy, yet too often neglected cause.

The twin funds, as the Disabled Ministers' and Widows' Funds might be termed, although not the same in title, do not differ in the class of their respective beneficiaries, as their names might seem to imply, but differ in the way by which benefits are secured. Both funds make payments to disabled ministers, or to the widows and children of deceased ministers. The Widows' Fund, which has been called "The Life Insurance Company of the Church," gives its benefits upon the foundation of payments annually made by, or in behalf of, individual ministers, and said payments accrue, independently of all question of financial need, upon the disability or death of the minister interested in the Fund; but the Disabled Ministers' Fund aids ministers disabled by sickness or age, and also widows and children of deceased ministers, when such may be in need and are recommended by Classis.

The Disabled Ministers' Fund was on May 1st, ult., $53,817.28, having been increased $50 by a legacy in the preceding year. The late Mr. James Suydam gave by legacy $30,000 to this fund. The income is, therefore, twofold; first, the interest accruing annually from the fund itself, and further, the contributions from the churches.

According to the Treasurer's statement May 1st, (Minutes '86, p. 116):

Interest on principal was	$2,758 98
Cash received from churches and individuals	2,427 65
Balance of May 1st, 1885	3,542 81
Total	$8,729 44

There was appropriated during the year $5,430. Deducting also the salary of the Treasurer, we find balance May 1st, 1886, $3,140.16. Contributions from churches and individuals were about $200 more than during the preceding year; but expenditures were some $400 more than the income, and lessened by so much the balance with which to begin another year. Appropriations are made semi-annually, May 1st and Nov. 1st. The Classes in recommending an applicant generally state the amount deemed necessary. Very frequently "the maximum" is stated instead of a definite sum; by which it is understood to make it as large as the fund will justify. Usually it means "give $200 if possible." When amounts are recommended they vary from $100 to $300, or, on an average, are $200 per annum.

The income of this fund for years has not been at all adequate to meet the Classical recommendations for aid, and only justifies appropriations on an average of about two-thirds of the amounts recommended. For instance, on May 1st last, the amount recommended by the several Classes was $7,876 for the twelve months following, or $3,938 for six months. Appropriations were made to Nov. 1st to the amount of $2,775, or $1,163 less than the amount recommended by the Classes. The balance in the treasury of $3,140.16, May 1st, should not mislead any as to the great need of increased revenue. The fund first secures its resources and then distributes them. It was because the treasury held the above sum that the appropriation of $2,775 was possible. The balance on hand was thus consumed, except $365.16.

The beneficiaries, May 1st, were as follows: 19 ministers, 19 ministers' widows, and 2 families—orphan children of ministers. Thus 40 cases were aided to the limited extent, on an average, of $138 per year. Could we read the list of those forty beneficiaries, we would doubtless find names precious in the memory of the Church, names suggestive of piety, learning and usefulness. The work of life, perhaps, is done—the salary has ceased, but physical needs continue.

Only 168 of our 536 churches contributed during the past year to this fund, and the number was exactly the same in the previous year. In 51 cases the sum contributed to this fund and the Widows' Fund was the same, implying, in general, we presume, that a collection was divided between the two objects. Eighty more churches, making 131 in all, contributed to both Funds How lamentable, however, is the fact that of the remaining 405 this only can be said, 37 made collections for the Disabled Ministers' Fund and 35 for the Widows' Fund! In ancient times God's people were charged never to forsake the Levites. An abundance was secured for them, although part of the tribe gave only 20 years of full service. At 50 they were to be free from all duties but those of superintendence. In our day, however, after a service of perhaps twice twenty years, a service laborious, yet protracted far beyond 50, many of God's servants in the ministry come to want. They appeal as a last resort to the Church, Classis endorses their appeal; but, alas! the fund cannot meet their needs. And why? Because 368 of our churches, or over 68 per cent, did not give one penny toward this worthy object, and 333 churches, or over 62 per cent did not do anything for this Fund or the Widows' Fund. We cannot believe that the explanation of these facts is in a lack of sympathy for our disabled ministers, but rather in a lack of information on the subject. Few, if any, will deny the right of the Disabled Ministers' Fund to an existence and a place of high honor in the warmest affections of the entire Church. The laity know as well as do ministers, that preaching the Gospel does not result in the accumulation of property. Few ministers, even in their days of strength, can do more than secure an economical support, and when the eye grows dim or the natural force abates, (and often before, through some manner of disability,) income ceases, and the provision for this crisis, which might have been secured in a secular calling, is wanting.

Surely, if our government, notwithstanding the proverbial ingratitude of republics, is pouring out its millions to pension the soldiers of the Civil War, the Church of God, with appreciation of ministerial labors, with its heart of love and large resources, should see that the worn-out soldiers of the Cross be supplied with at least food and raiment. The great Methodist Church contributed last year $180,000 for aged ministers, widows and orphans. Frequently have our religious papers reported recently the gifts of homes for aged clergymen. Thus the wealth of the Church is yielding to the claims of a noble object, and is there not encouragement here to all of our pastors to urge upon their congregations the justness of an annual collection for disabled ministers, and also to show clearly the Scriptural basis on which such appeal rests?

Boston Letter.

November 17th, 1886.

"WHAT do you think of Brooks' sermon?" is a question that has been put with interest in Boston. This did not mean Phillips Brooks' masterly production at the late Harvard celebration, on the morning that Mrs. President Cleveland was among his auditors, bringing in her wake such a curious crowd that the overflow of spectators reached the very chancel steps. But after his return from the General Convention of the Episcopal Church at Chicago, whither his diocese sent him as a delegate, he gave a discourse on the convention, and this is the one talked about. He specially referred to the effort there to drop the old banner under which so many bloodless battles have been fought,—"Protestant Episcopal,"—and adopt a title like that of "American Catholic Church," as proposed by Dr. Adams, of Wisconsin. Dr. Brooks conceded that the movement to change the name would have shown a very different front if pushed for æsthetic reasons alone. What he specially disliked was the animus of the movement. He doubtless saw at Chicago a spirit that was exclusive and narrow, a spirit that thrives and yet continually growns leaner on the dogma of Apostolic succession. The big, broad soul of the rector of Trinity was not comfortable under this pressure. He could not contain himself, but poured out a very refreshing stream of ideas that would have delighted the heart of Dean Stanley could he have been a listener at Trinity. Dr. Brooks strenuously opposed the claims of Apostolic succession, a dogma that is not in the formularies of the Episcopal Church, though it is held by some within its communion. He was not willing to unchurch the great host of Christians in this country who had done such grand work for Christ. A clergyman who heard this sermon told me it was "a tremendous effort," and he emphasized his opinion with a very solemn shake of the head. The sermon has attracted much attention and comment, and the discussion provoked will be a very healthy one.

A Ritualist and His Church.

Rev. C. C. Grafton is the rector of the Church of the Advent, a new brick structure, the sharp slant of its Gothic lines everywhere expressing aspiration. It is not entirely completed yet; there will be a grand tower some day lifting its spire almost two hundred feet into the air. The Advent is a ritualistic centre. Before the chancel runs a lofty, shining rood-screen, surmounted by a crucifix. At the right of the chancel is a small chapel for early "mass" and other services.

Mr. Grafton is an energetic, forcible speaker, and though a ritualist, has a robustness the very opposite of asceticism. When the Episcopal clergy gave Phillips Brooks a breakfast after his last return from Europe, Mr. Grafton was one of the speakers on that occasion. In a spirit of catholicity he referred to the various schools of thought that had hitherto found a home in the Episcopal Church, and suggested that here might be found material for a new movement, combining the excellencies of each. Mr. Grafton lately made an address before our Evangelical Alliance, and his theme was "Revival Methods or Missions in the Episcopal Church." He gave, during his address, an account of missions conducted in London, and spoke of the aid given by Gladstone, also by the Premier's wife and son.

In Mr. Grafton's parish there has been a singular controversy. The Governing Board of the parish is a close corporation. Parishioners tendered a donation of six thousand dollars to the corporation toward the completion of the church, on the condition that these parishioners should have the privilege of nominating to the corporation candidates to fill vacancies in that body, the corporation judging of their fitness. The corporation, though, decidedly said, "nay." Some of St. Peter's keys dangle from their girdle, and they are not going to give them up to the rector himself.

Dr. Withrow and Chicago.

"Will Dr. Withrow go to Chicago?" am I asked. An impression prevails that he will accept the call renewed by the Chicago Presbyterians. I can see reasons for this opinion of outsiders. I believe his heart is really among Presbyterians, and then is not precedent on the side of a "Park street" pastor's acceptance of a call declined and then renewed? Dr. A. L. Stone, it is not forgotten, was invited to go from Park street to San Francisco. With his musical voice Dr. Stone said a silvery "no" to San Francisco. They persisted, and he said "yes."

The Andover Problem.

And the Andover controversy still drags its limitless length along. The Visitors of the Seminary now have before them in due form the charges against the implicated professors, and the public patiently—impatiently rather—awaits the decision. Whatever the decision be, the case will doubtless be taken to the Supreme Court by the losing side, and the end may be a long way ahead. The so-called "Andover" movement has to its current a depth and width not at all commensurate with the size of that theological reservoir on the Andover hill-top. It has the name of a school, but is affecting very essentially the history of a denomination. In some way this stream is continually breaking forth. I notice that Dr. Munger's church, New Haven, desires the calling of a council to settle the case of Rev. Robert Hume who, on account of his views on retribution, has not been sent back to his mission-field. If the council be called, it will emphasize and send out to wider fields the present discussion. It will settle Mr. Hume's case, but what of the subject involved? Mr. Alpheus Hardy, Chairman of the Prudential Committee of the American Board, who lately resigned his position, is a prominent member of the Old South Church, whose pastor, Mr. Gordon, belongs to the New School Congregationalists. In the Second Church, Dorchester, doctrinal difficulties have occasioned serious divergence of opinion, the pastor, Rev. E. N. Packard, calling for the resignation of two of his Sunday-school teachers, whose views, he feels, are not in harmony with the orthodox standards of the Church.

The Methodists at the Hub.

While these divisive influences are at work, the Methodists are trying to bring everybody into a loving frame of mind. They could not get the Baptists and Congregationalists to endorse Sam Jones, and so they have tried a flank union-movement. Rev. Dr. Webb of the Congregational Club, Hon. E. C. Fitz of the Baptist Union, Mr. J. B. Horton of the Universalist Union, were invited guests of the Methodist Social Union at its late gathering, and made addresses. Dr. Webb said he had made the tour of the Social Unions in Boston and was a good Christian yet. Where this circuit-rider had been, I cannot say. He referred to the excellent ministers the Methodists had sent among the Congregationalists, and tendered his congratulations—to the Methodists. It may be added here that the followers of Wesley are strengthening their foundations in Boston, and the prosperity of Boston University is one sign. Its interests have lately received another push. The school is quite popular among the young ladies of the vicinity who are seeking collegiate instruction. This does not interfere with the success of the "Annex" at Cambridge. It has this year a larger number of students than ever.

The Anniversary at Cambridge.

Harvard kept its 250th anniversary—and, to repeat a big-sounding synonym, its quarter-millennial, with great eclat. Such quantities of learning as walked up and down the streets of the humble(?) little college-town,—lawyers, doctors of divinity, physicians, poets, judges, college presidents, and even Cleveland himself—all gathered to help raise some note of the jubilee chorus. James Russell Lowell's address, Oliver Wendell Holmes' poem, President Cleveland's speech, were all very acceptable to their auditors. The University, generally so chary of its favors, showered to right and left about forty honorary degrees, and the great men were kept bowing a long time before these compliments were all picked up.

After the quarter-millennial celebration in Sanders' Theatre, so grand and imposing, came within a week a very different gathering on that notable platform; just Moody, the evangelist, with the plain, old Gospel, and a band of singers. It was a meeting under the auspices of the Harvard Young Men's Christian Association. Moody's plain words were on "Sowing and Reaping." Subsequent meetings were appointed in the Shepard Memorial Church (Dr. McKenzie's). The big scholastic anniversary was helpful. Harvard, solemnly given in infancy to Christ and the Church (Christo et ecclesiæ), needs now the ever serious, beneficent outpouring of the Holy Ghost, that it may be duly fitted for its great work.

SOJOURNER.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“FROM MEADOW-SWEET TO MISTLETOE;” Verses with Pictures by Mary A. Lathbury, is a superb Christmas book within and without for the little folks. The figures with their floral and other appropriate embelishments are graceful and spirited, and the verses will charm the little people, while fastening good principles in the memory in an agreeable fashion. The book is a very beautiful one and will be received with delight by those for whom it has been prepared. (Worthington Co.)

....“MADAME TABBY'S ESTABLISHMENT.” By Kari. That cats have a world of their own has often been believed, and this pleasant writer tells the story of a little girl who was introduced into the charmed circle. Like the famous “Alice in Wonderland,” she found that kittens and “tabbies” have their joys and sorrows, their friendships and envies, very much as in the world of men and women. Doubtless many a youngster will find the greatest pleasure in tracing Diana's fortune among the feline race, for the author certainly makes the record entertaining, and the pictures give a vivid impression of the characters. (Macmillan & Co.)

....“GINEVRA.” By Susan E. Wallace. Illustrated by Gen. Lew. Wallace. The sad old story of the fair bride hidden away in the oak chest is here drawn out into a Christmas story, to which are added the poem of Samuel Rogers and the ballad of the Mistletoe Bough. Ginevra's youth and Lord Lovel's courtship are portrayed at length, and the catastrophe is more quickly passed over. The illustrations are no special addition, to our thinking, in spite of the distinguished artist, excepting the very beautiful head which faces the title page. With its illustrated cover the book strikes the attention, and will make a very acceptable Christmas gift for the little ones. (The Worthington Co.)

....“MY SERMON-NOTES.” By Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. (Matthew to Acts.) These notes, selected from outlines of discourses delivered by Mr. Spurgeon in the ordinary course of his ministry, are published with a view to aiding ministers in the preparation of sermons. As admirable homiletic studies they are worthy of attention, even from those who scorn the use of “pulpit helps.” These notes may also be used to advantage—if wisely and cautiously used—in the preparation of sermons on the particular texts of which they treat. The diligent student will appreciate their suggestiveness and will find in them a wholesome stimulus to thought. Of course, they are not meant for the indolent, and will be used by them only to their injury. (Carters.)

....“DADDY DAVE.” By Mary Frances. The faithful and trusted slave whose life and character is sketched in this readable little volume, was undoubtedly the type of a large class, and the story of their lives exhibits a view of slavery which is essential to a fairly comprehensive estimate of the institution. The view thus afforded is in striking contrast with the darker aspects predominating in many localities. The present sketch portrays a strong, influential character, unique in many striking traits, affectionately attached to his master's interests, staunch in fidelity through every change of fortune, and eminently useful. The story is very well told, and certainly is eminently worth the telling. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

....“THE BOOK OF ELOQUENCE. A Collection of Extracts in Prose and Verse.” By C. D. Warner. These extracts are taken from the most famous orators and poets, and are intended as exercises in declamation in colleges and schools. The author has sought to present new and spirited extracts, without losing sight of the masterpieces of eloquence, (Chatham, Patrick Henry, Webster, etc.,) which never grow old nor become stale by repetition. In our judgment he has succeeded very well, and the book will be found a decided improvement upon former works of the kind. (Lee & Shepard.)

....In “NATURE'S SERIAL STORY,” E. P. Roe tries the experiment of combining his two styles and specialties. He twines a story of love and life about the practical description and discussion of agricultural and horticultural matters, as the human and the “nature” development proceed side by side to their predestined and harmonious end. The idea is an original one, and we are sensible of its poetic effect throughout. It need hardly be said, however, that while the scientific side of the combination is greatly aided in its interest and significance, the story side the sufferer. Taken as a whole, this book strikes us as decidedly in advance of Mr. Roe's previous productions in a literary point of view. The publishers have issued a new edition of this book, uniform with their neat and popular edition of Mr. Roe's works. (Dodd, Mead & Co.)

....“THE WISDOM OF THE APOCALYPSE,” by J. H. McIlvane, is an exposition of the Apocalypse characterized by good sense and intelligent exegesis. It presents at least plausible solutions of its many obscurities and mysteries. The author casts aside the prevalent theory that the book was mainly intended to represent historical events, and finds the key to its interpretation in the suggestion that it represents truths, ideas, and events, only in so far as they exemplify these ideas. His interpretation of the symbols of the book is based on Scripture usage, and is rational and consistent. The method employed yields results at least intelligible and instructive. Many passages receive new light and meaning from the author's treatment. (A. D. F. Randolph &. Co.)

....“JOTTINGS FROM THE PACIFIC.” By W. Wyatt Gill, B.A. The islands of the Pacific have been the scene of most wonderful missionary success, and in this volume an actor in the great work gives us notes made during the progress of the conquest. The book is charming for its simplicity, as well as for the truthful descriptions it contains. One part takes us from island to island, another section gives the manner of preaching by native Christians, and the third part contains zoological and botanical notes. Then follow jottings on miscellaneous subjects, some of which are novelties indeed, as for instance, a “prayer upon the extraction of a child's tooth.” We cordially recommend the book with its illustrations as one of the best kind for the library of the Sunday-school or home. (American Tract Society.)

....“A DEMIGOD.” This is certainly a remarkable story, unique in its conception and, with some faults, remarkably well carried out in its details. The “demigod” is the descendant of an English physician who resolves to live in Greece in order to raise up a race which shall be near the ideal of humanity in body and soul. An American party of travellers meets the result of the physician's endeavors in the young Hector Vyr, who rescues the travellers from brigands, entertains them peculiarly and finally marries the pretty Boston girl. The book is certainly a strong one, both in its classical and metaphysical phases. (Harper & Brothers.)

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The Atlantic for December ends a year of unsurpassed excellence in certain lines. Its serial stories have been the best work of their authors; the “Golden Justice” of William H. Bishop coming to its end with a description of a tornado, which is a wonderful bit of writing, and Miss Murfrees' “In the Clouds” concluding with a most artistic and subtle discrimination of the fate of the various characters. A posthumous paper of Prof. Mulford treats of “The Object of a University,” two articles have Russia for their theme, there is an excellent defence of Mazzini's noble aims, and a discussion of “The Intellectual Mission of the Saracens.” One very light story brings in more of the Hindu nonsense for which “Dr. Isaacs” paved the way, and is really serio-comic in its ending. A supplement gives the full text of Lowell's recent Harvard oration, with its magnificent peroration of praise to our worthy President, as well as Dr. Holmes's poem, with its unfortunate Unitarian sneer at evangelical religion under the name of the “Church of Calvin.” We do not wonder at Dr. McCosh's disgust. Age has evidently done little to enlighten the moral ignorance of the witty poet, whose work would have pleased all had the reference to Andover been left out. The claim that Harvard theology has lit up the once orthodox school will be resented by those he would praise as much as by those whom he so evidently dreads.

“On the hill where old beliefs were bound,”

....The Musical Herald for November contains, with much other good reading, an interesting account of the work done by a musical evangelist among the natives of South India. The selections of sacred music in this number are remarkably fine.

....The Musical Visitor gives every month a large amount of information valuable to singers and players. The December number will contain a full supply of Christmas music.

....The Medical Missionary Record for November contains an account of Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, with a likeness, which, though not a work of high art, is very correct and spirited. It also contains a letter from Dr. Summers, now serving in Africa with Bishop Taylor, giving a very interesting statement of his work in that lonely field. He was the first student of the Institute here, and seems to be doing a very good work. He is self-supported.

....The Methodist Review, November, opens with a portrait and a sketch of Dr. S. D. Rice, shows that the Episcopacy of Methodism is a function, not a distinct order, (one wonders that this should ever have been doubted,) cleverly expounds the Prophecy of Jacob, which is done by Dr. M. S. Terry, and discusses the always living topic, Foreign Missionary Methods, which is not yet in all points settled. The editorial departments are well filled.

....The New Englander, November, has a good account of The Red Cross, reviews sensibly Freeman and Stubbs on Methods of Historical Study, and very sharply Ruskin's lampoon on Gibbon and Grote, and gives a sensible paper by Van Millingen on the Struggle in Bulgaria. There is also some intelligent criticism of Prof. Drummond's “Natural Man.” President Dwight's excellent address at Dwight Hall, and the usual notices of books, fill out the number.

....The Expositor, October, begins a very interesting and suggestive account of Ewald's Life and Works, by Prof. Cheyne, and a candid criticism, by Prof. Davidson, of the Revised Version of the Book of Job. It continues Dr. McLaren's exposition of Colossians, and Dr. M. Dodd's comment on Zechariah, both fresh and able. The latter treats the vexed question of the authorship of the last six chapters with good sense and fairness. He holds the traditional view.

A DELIGHTFUL NEW SERIES OF RELIGIOUS VOLUMES.

A series of volumes (of both prose and verse) of a religious nature. Much attention has been given to the make-up of these books, the intention being to render them especially desirable as gifts for those in affliction, aged people and others, as well as for all persons at such times as Christmas, Lent and Easter.

1. OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. Thomas à Kempis.

2. RELIGIOUS POEMS. Edited by C. E. Alexander.

3. THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS. John Bunyan.

4. MAKE THY WAY MINE, AND OTHER POEMS. By George Klingle. A volume of poems, chiefly religious, of very great merit. Many of these have appeared in THE INDEPENDENT, THE CHRISTIAN UNION and others of the highest class of religious periodicals.

Each 1 vol. 16mo., clear type, with wide margins, on very fine laid paper. Pale brown cloth, appropriate ornamentation on covers in silver and gold. Each volume $1. Photo-etching binding, with photo-etching of some famous painting on parchment paper cover, in box, $1.

ATTRACTIVE AND CHOICE EDITIONS OF POEMS.

Five interesting additions to "The Lyric Poets."

SIR JOHN SUCKLING'S POEMS.

A new edition with memoir and notes. Edited by Frederick A. Stokes. With new etching by J. S. King, after the portrait by Vandyke, Ready in December.

THE BALLAD BOOK. Allingham.

SUMPTUOUS ART BOOKS.

A Handsomely Illustrated Edition of Victor Hugo's Masterpiece.

LES MISERABLES.

With nearly four hundred illustrations by DE NEUVILLE, BAYARD, and other eminent artists. Royal 8vo, cloth boards, 5 vols., $15.00.

No expense has been spared to make of unrivalled beauty this new edition of the greatest production of the greatest modern French author. Typographically De Vinne & Co., printers to THE CENTURY COMPANY, have made it almost a faultless book. Some of the most eminent French artists are the designers of the nearly 400 illustrations. These by master-hands are not, as is too often the case in illustrated works, mere fancy sketches, but works of art by men thoroughly acquainted with the places and personages described, thoroughly French in feeling and spirit, and in full sympathy with the author. Last, but not least among the illustrators, is Victor Hugo himself, who contributes a specimen of his highly forcible sketches.

Of the popularity of Les Misérables there is no need to reassert that it has been unrivalled. Its record proves that it is as popular as when it first appeared. Every language has its Les Misérables; and its countless editions but increase a demand for more, and finer, productions, of which the present, by Routledge & Sons, is the most superb.

An Exquisitely Illustrated Edition of GOLDSMITH'S VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

With Prefatory Memoir by GEORGE SAINTSBURY, and 114 colored illustrations by V. A. POIRSON. Royal 8vo, handsomely bound in extra cloth, with appropriate designs in colors, and gilt top, $5.00; three-quarters levant morocco, gilt top, rough edges, $8.00; tree calf, gilt edges, gilt in the round, $10.00; full levant morocco, gilt edges, gilt in the round, $12.00.

This beautiful book forms a companion volume to V. A. POIRSON'S handsome and very successful edition of "Gulliver's Travels," issued last season.

Goldsmith's pathos and dry humor as presented in "The Vicar of Wakefield," have been most exquisitely pictured in delicate tones and tints. A charming story is made more charming by these scenes and figures with which the book abounds. The pose of the figures, with their unique surroundings, compose a story of their own, while they gratify the eye.

THE FRENCHWOMAN OF THE CENTURY: Fashions, Manners, Usages.

By OCTAVE UZANNE, author of "THE FAN," "THE GLOVE," "THE UMBRELLA," and "THE MUFF." Exquisitely illustrated in colors from designs by ALBERT LYNCH. Engraved by EUGENE GAUJEAN. Printed on hand-made paper, 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, in a box, $15.00.

As only 500 of these exquisite volumes have been printed, out of which 300 have been taken by the British market, the American market is strictly limited to 200 copies, the type having been distributed.

This book is filled with dainty and unique illustrations, engraved in colors from the water-color designs of Mr. Albert Lynch. The chief men and women of this period are graphically described, with which mingles amusing "chit-chat." The writer has, very happily, combined a minutia of detail with comprehensiveness of treatment.

A Magnificently Illustrated Gift Book.

ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND.

A picturesque Survey of the United Kingdom and its Institutions. By P. VILLARS. Translated from the French by HENRY FRITH. Imperial 4to, gilt edges, with six hundred illustrations drawn expressly for this work by the best artists, from photographs or sketches taken on the spot. 650 pages. Cloth, $10.00,

A superb volume. Within handsome covers is a treat of information delightfully given, and a wealth of beautiful pictures exquisitely printed.

RANDOLPH CALDECOTT.

A Personal Memoir of his Early Art Career. By HENRY BLACKBURN, author of "BRETON FOLK," "ARTISTS AND ARABS," etc. With one hundred and seventy-two full-page and other illustrations by RANDOLPH CALDECOTT. 4to, handsomely bound in cloth, $6.00.

Also a Large-Paper Edition, of which only a few copies have been printed. Cloth extra, gilt top, rough edges, $10.00.

Mr. Caldecott is known to the world chiefly by his Picture-Books. Possessed of a sense of beauty, and an abundance of kindly and graceful humor, he did not lack delicacy nor quaintness. "He had a capital eye for simple character, and united in his sketches and animals the shrewdest observation with the most whimsical personal view." The text of the book claims to be but "a setting for the illustrations." The "Memoirs" contain extracts from letters and sketches, the most of which were sent to the author's family.

A Fitting Companion Volume to the "Memoirs" is:

THE LATE RANDOLPH CALDECOTT'S CHRISTMAS BOOK.

MORE "GRAPHIC" PICTURES. A new series of Mr. CALDECOTT'S contributions to the "Graphic" Newspaper. Printed in colors. Oblong boards, $3.00.

THE HISTORY OF MANON LESCAUT AND THE CHEVALIER DES GRIEUX.

By the ABBE PREVOST. With 225 original illustrations by Maurice Leloir, and 12 page-etchings, reproduced by the Goupil process. (Uniform with the Leloir Edition of the "Sentimental Journey.") In a cloth double portfolio, $20.00.

This production is the masterpiece of its author. Abbé Prévost is well known as a distinguished French littérateur, whose literary and political essays have been pronounced "the soundest, the most acute, the most scholarly, and the most elegant that have proceeded from the journalists of that country." "Manon Lescaut," Dean Swift says, "is entirely free from the licentious tendency of the works of Crebillon, with whom Prévost has been unjustly classed. There is, in 'Manon Lescaut,' nothing of the sickly sentimentality of Prévost's contemporaries, nor of the disgusting coarseness of modern 'Littérateur Extravagante.'" The English translation is clear and animated. The book is a triumph of typography and decoration. The artist' M. Leloir, has employed, in his figures, a style that is admirably matched by the richness of the tones, lights, and shadows of his etching needle in the larger cuts. Borders and vignettes adorn every page of the volume. They are delicately finished in character, beautifully designed, and engraved in a perfect manner. There are twelve full-page etchings; the vignettes and ornamented borders number more than two hundred and twenty-five. The artist has mastered the nature of Manon, her beauty, her charm, and her affectionateness.

THE PARABLES OF OUR SAVIOR

Expounded and Illustrated. Uniform with same author's "Limitation of Life," "Contrary Winds" and other sermons. Crown octavo, 453 pages. $1.75 each.

"The recent works of Professor Bruce and Goebel have broken new ground in this department, and the author's aim has been to turn their fruitful suggestions to good homiletical account. The little volumes of Dr. Dods are full of richest nuggets. But the present work, while indebted in different respects to these authors, will be found to be in others independent of them all."—Author's Preface.

Holy wings to heaven upbore her,
Pinions twain of Peace and Praise.

Peace within, deep, sacred, tranquil,
Peace of Jesus Christ her Lord.
Praise upspringing, like a fountain,
Clear and joyous, heavenward.

Peace for those who slept in Jesus,
"Pax," "In pace," -record sweet!
Peace and praise for them unending,
Deeper peace and praise more meet.

Early glimpses of believers,
Show them singing thanks and laud.
Lifting clearly in the morning
"Hymns of praise to Christ, a God."

Let us lift a loud thanksgiving,
From the deep peace He has given.
Let the clear notes of our triumph,
Like a fountain, rise toward heaven.

Endless thanks for endless mercies,
Boundless thanks for boundless love;
Thanks to Him who gave our being,
That in Him we live and move.

Thanks to Him, who victory winning,
Bitter death and sorrows bore.
Thanks that He, once dead, now liveth,
And shall live forevermore.

Thanks that by His blood He bought us.
Thanks that we His love may trace,
Backward, forward, through the ages;
Thanks that it is all of grace.

Thanks that we may be co-workers.
Thanks for power to conquer sin.
For the Spirit's inner teaching,
For His hidden work within.

Christ, amid Thy Church triumphant,
Thee we praise. To Thee we sing.
This our full, our glad Thanksgiving,
Jesus Christ is Lord and King! MARY C. GATES.

A Second Youth.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

A "SECOND CHILDHOOD" is recognized in the calendar of life's experience, a time when energies are relaxed and when the soul-fires are burnt low; but we do not realize the fact that there is a second youth—an experience available to the majority of us.

A "second childhood" may have a certain beauty about it, but it is hard for us to divorce the idea of childlike trust from childlike helplessness, and those of us who are in the midst of life's achievements rarely anticipate such an experience with anything but dread. But a second youth is a sort of aftermath—a season of aspiration, as well as of fulfillment.

We have all of us, surely some time in life, come upon a face that, bearing indisputable marks of the passage of the years that were not few nor empty of care, seemed to deny the fact of age and to defy inanition and decay.

Have we caught in such a face a look full of the spirit of the onward march, and at the same time one of a kind of repose which signifies a mental and spiritual equilibrium? If so, we have met one with a second youth glorifying his experience.

This second youth has been usually supposed as the prerogative of woman, perhaps, above men, and though both may enjoy it, it does seem to be an especial compensation to woman, when, at middle-age or between that time and old age, it comes at the first pause when one looks back over the way which has been trodden, sometimes with groans and sometimes with songs of joy.

The children are grown—have some of them builded home nests for themselves; heart and mind have lost their feverishness, the hopes and energies are adjusted to life's purposes, and though the steps must henceforth tend toward the end, and the eyes seek the western horizon, life is not over. With a recognition of the claims of the Highest upon the late as well as early service of His creatures, one in passing the way between middle life and old age may find that fountain of youth which shall, notwithstanding disappointments in men and in events, furnish to the soul living water which shall keep the springs of energy unclogged and pure, and the heart trustful and hopeful.

If, when scattered children gather in waiting homes to renew their own youth beside the lighted hearth, they find in the faces of those upon whom the years have left their mark the signs of an experience of a second youth, then will the home cheer be hearty, and the home atmosphere be filled with the elements of true Thanksgiving.

Thanks-Giving.

"I FELT just like saying a 'thank you' to God," said a dear girl to me, when speaking of a blessing received that hour from our Father. The quick recognition that it was the Lord's doing and the tone of affectionate heartiness, spoke emphatically of that girl's Christian character.

We would scarcely be guilty of such rudeness as to pass by a favor, kindness, courtesy or gift unacknowledged, and yet do we pause to say the "thank you" to God? For 'tis His care alone that preserves us so marvellously, as we go up and down in the bustling world. We inhale blessings by our very breath almost, and quite as unconsciously.

A sweet child once noticing how the little birds took a drink, said: "Mamma, they look up to God after every sip, as though they wanted to thank Him."

I doubt not we pray often, but we crave so much; our petitions are largely supplication and very meagre thanksgiving.

We deem a person very negligent who chances to forget the thanks due ourselves. Don't let us grow careless in our acceptance of all our many gifts from above, and not return thanks to God.

Then, too, we try to show our appreciation of the present given us—the pleasure arranged for our enjoyment, the little unexpected surprises that loving forethought has taken for us, and all along our way not a day is unmarked by some token of our Father's love for us. How are we showing by word and deed that the bestowment has not been in vain?

'Twas aptly said, "Thanksgiving's best demonstration is thanks living." RESPONDER.

Thanksgiving Posies.

"OH, how lovely!" burst from one and another when it was fairly done, and the merry bevy of girls stood in a semi-circle of admiring ecstacy viewing the beautiful work their busy hands and active brains had just completed. It was a sight worth an artist's study—the faces of these bright young girls, flushed with health and happiness—happiness of the purest kind, for they were working to give joy to others, these girls of the "Spring Dale Flower Mission Band." And then the work they had just completed, it could not be more exquisite in execution or design.

For it was Thanksgiving morning at Spring Dale, and while the bell chimed "Come, come, come," from the belfry of the quaint stone village church, people from far and near wended their way thither. While Deacon Jones jogged on at a faster trot than usual in his old "one-hoss shay," and Elder Smythe walked a little quicker through the crisp morning air than the rheumatism would usually permit. Fannie, Belle and Grace added the finishing touches to the already beautiful church. For a wandering vine would sometimes go astray, as wanderers will; and a saucy autumn leaf would turn its back on its more aristocratic neighbor just for fun. To those who saw it for the first time it was a marvel of beauty. True, Deacon Jones shook his head at all this display of leaf and flower, grain and fruit, which almost buried the old-time pulpit in a bed of fragrance and beauty, and wondered what the world was coming to when these young people could transform the sober old meeting-house into a bed of posies, and what the good domine would say when he saw all this "fixing up."

Miss Jemima Snipkins, the village dressmaker and oracle, told Mrs. Allen, "She thought it a shame to bring all them things into church, if it was Thanksgiving day. Why not," said she, "let 'em live out their nateral life, and not die before their time;" and as they entered a pew side by side, "Sister Allen," as most of the people loved to call her, answered: "They have made it a 'garden of the Lord.'" Her loving heart responded to the evergreen text which swung its bright berries and leaves aloft, "Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." Just then the old bell gave a last impatient "Come, come," as if it really could wait no longer to begin. The domine entered the pulpit by a side door, while the girls, one and all, picked up their baskets and disappeared.

Now it was that the silent lips of the organ burst into a rapturous voluntary from the grand old "Stabat Mater," and the good man looked around.

Banks of tropical plants and exotics filled the platform. Calla lilies, like perfumed censers, poured forth the fragrance of their golden hearts. Immortelles, like silvery stars, crowned the crimson sumach, which stood blushing in its autumn gown, while chrysanthemums on every side made it gorgeous with their beauty. Autumn leaves, entwined with scarlet berries and graceful grain, clasped themselves about the reading desk, while fluffy clematis climbed exultingly to the topmost point of the golden organ pipe, and even ventured to twine its longest spray about the beams of the vaulted roof. Pyramids of fruit supported upon columns of red and black corn, between which hung luscious white and purple grapes, stood here and there; while grain in the sheaf, and even vegetables in the background, added their rich and russet shades, and silently seemed to tell of the goodness of God.

"Great is the Lord, the Lord's name be praised," came from the choir, who sang in an exultant strain; and, notwithstanding good Deacon Jones' pious fears, the "fixin' up" did not seem to disturb the minister at all. In fact, the grand words and music of the anthem, together with the living thanksgiving all around, inspired him with new thoughts. He put aside the long and finely polished discourse and preached from a full heart of "thanks-living," as well as "thanksgiving." No dry statistics, no gloomy forebodings for the future,—the earthquakes and accidents of the past,—all were swallowed up and forgotten for the time being. Only the mercy and love of God, illustrated by the flowers and fruits direct from His hands, mute monuments of His loving kindness, served to add a point to his simple heartfelt words; and at his "Let us return thanks," every head was bowed. Sister Allen wiped away a silent tear, for though she had lived through deep sadness during the past year, as her widow's cap testified, still she felt the goodness of the Lord deep down in her heart, and returned thanks as devoutly as others who seemed never to have had a sorrow or a care.

When the contribution was announced "for the poor of the church," it was hard work, but he did it, Deacon Jones did, much to his own surprise, for he had begun to think of himself as others did, that he was rather a close man. After using his handkerchief in a suspicious way, and wiping his moist eyes, (they always would water in a cold day,) actually out came the old black pocket-book, and in the plate rang like a golden Thanksgiving bell the "pocket piece" he had carried "five year for good luck."

His heart beat so happily way down there in the spot most people considered vacant, when he thought of all the good it would do! He actually confessed to Elder Smythe going down the aisle that it was the biggest piece of luck he ever had, that is, that he happened to have the gold piece in his pocket that day. For he often kept it in the toe of a stocking on a Sunday, or hid on the next to the top shelf in the pantry in an old tea caddy.

This little golden bell rang so loud and so clear that the plate was piled high that day, and the Thanksgiving flowers had performed this part of their mission well. Even Jemima Snipkins thought better of it, only in the vestibule she mourned to Sister Allen: "Well, is all them flowers and fruits and things left to wither and die, doing no good to nobody?" But it was the young girls of the "Flower Mission" who answered this practical question, and not Sister Allen.

Out they tramped, each with her basket filled to overflowing with the dainty, trailing things—a dozen and more, bright and happy with the success of their Thanksgiving posies. Boys followed on, bearing fruit. One aspiring youth wore upon his head a gorgeous yellow turban; or so it appeared in the distance. In reality it was only a field pumpkin. He pranced up to the door of old Aunt Judy, who hadn't eaten a pumpkin pie for many a long day, and rolled it into the kitchen, making a great clatter, frightening the old lady almost out of her wits. So they went from door to door, carrying happiness and thanksgivings to many a poor soul that day.

"Ah! Miss Grace," said blind Nettie, as she sat with her lap filled with every fragrant flower the basket contained, "they seem like baby angels come to comfort me." Caressingly her sensitive fingers touched the petals one by one. She could feel their beauty, breathe their fragrance, and even though the dimmed eyes could never behold their loveliness, she was satisfied. Ah! these Thanksgiving posies, were they not flower-angels come to comfort one of God's little ones?

Meanwhile, Belle, with her bright and merry ways, was sitting in a little room near by doing all she could to cheer up Ned Atkins. Poor boy! he could see little to be thankful for just now. Six weeks he had been laid up with a broken leg. His poor mother could ill afford to provide him with luxuries, and now in this holiday time those afflictions seemed harder than ever to bear.

But when Belle displayed the luscious grapes, oranges and russet pears, he began to think Thanksgiving day was not such a failure after all.

One place still was left to visit, as the girls met upon the corner, Fannie carrying her basket overflowing with white chrysanthemums. It was one of their own "Flower Mission Band" to whom they went, for Alice Ray, who had started this mission in the village a year ago, lay ill; and to her home they brought the flowers she most loved.

But another messenger had hastened with swift feet before them.

While the bell chimed "Come," her sweet spirit answered the summons and had gone to be "forever with the Lord." They covered the still form they loved so well with the pale, fair flowers, and softly sang:

"Asleep in Jesus, blessed sleep,
From which none ever wakes to weep."

For why should they mourn? She had begun an eternal Thanksgiving day above. J. S. K.

....."BIBLE WARNINGS: Sermons to Children." By the Rev. Richard Newton, D.D. Dr. Newton, who has done such grand work by preaching in Gospel simplicity and sincerity to the children, gives us now some of the fruit of his old age. He calls attention to the signal lights hung out by God's Word against various sins, such as covetousness, intemperance, lying, pride and selfishness. As usual we have each assertion impressed by a good anecdote or natural illustration. Pastors and teachers will find helpful stimulus in these earnest words and bright stories. (Robert Carter & Brothers.)

...."THAT QUISSET HOUSE." By Mrs. Nathaniel Conklin (Jennie M. Drinkwater). It is refreshing to read such a book as this. It has genius in it, and genius in the service of religion. The story is of a large household in which six girls and a boy grow up to manhood and womanhood. The love of God, their Saviour, comes as a practical influence on life, and in the development of each character faith plays the most important part. There are sections of the story which are equal to Mrs. Prentiss's best writing, as, for instance, the diary of Mrs. Huntley, with its application of God's Word to the circumstances of human life. We trust "That Quisset House" will be on the table of many of our best homes, we are so sure of its awakening thought and giving the highest pleasure. It should take a high place among the most prized works of religious literature. (Robert Carter & Brothers.)

...."HOW TO WIN." A Book for Girls. By Frances E. Willard, President of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. With an Introduction by Rose Elizabeth Cleveland. A sensible, earnest, timely volume, sympathetic, serious and carefully wrought out, that will "set its readers to thinking," as Miss Cleveland says. (Funk & Wagnalls.)

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

A Thanksgiving Service.

"NOT many people in church to-day," whispered Miss Clementine Rosier, the leading soprano, to Professor Napier, the organist. Her remark was a just one. The building was large, handsome, and in every way attractive.

On Sundays it was filled with a congregation who listened eagerly to the preaching of the Rev. Dr. Fergus, the revered pastor. But this was Thanksgiving day and there were not many people in church.

Some of the flock had, no doubt, left their city homes and gone back for a time to the New England firesides by which they had been reared. Some, the active, care-taking Marthas, were probably hovering over ranges and cooking-stoves, making preparations for the dinner which they considered the chief event of the day. Men of business were taking a rest—nodding over their newspapers and pulling their cigars, as though in seeking food for their souls they might not have found rest for mind and body. Children were reading story books and playing with toys—too careless or too indifferent to go to church on a week day.

Yet there were some who thought it a pleasure, no less than a duty, to attend the Thanksgiving service. Among these were Mr. and Mrs. Dallas and their two children, Millie and Leonard.

On entering the building they found a great delight in looking at the pulpit, with its graceful decorations of autumn leaves and fruits.

Soon the choir sang in a sudden burst of harmony: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; for His mercy endureth forever. O that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men! And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare His works with rejoicing."

"Wasn't that beautiful?" whispered Millie to her brother. She was not in the habit of whispering in church, but this music had been so wonderful that it seemed as though she must speak. Child though she was, she felt herself filled with an intense desire to praise the mighty Lord, of whom the singers had been singing.

Pretty soon came the sermon. It was not about politics at home or abroad; not about wars threatened in one country or another; not about the laws of trade or the demands of commerce. It was a reminder of the mercies which were a part of the life of each man, woman and child in the congregation. It was an appeal similar to the one uttered by the Apostle Paul: "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service."

"This," said Dr. Fergus, "is the thank-offering which everyone should make. It is the thank-offering which it seems to me everyone will make if he stops to think but a few moments of how much the Lord, in His great love, has done for us. The only return which we can offer is to love Him with all our hearts and to show our love by kind deeds toward one another."

Millie listened to the sermon as she had done to the singing. On her way home she said to her brother, "Leonard, you and I are thankful. Don't you think we are?"

"Guess we ought to be," said Leonard. "Not many folks in this world have more to be thankful for. Why we have everything, Sis, everything that we could wish for. I think we ought to give something away."

"I think so too," replied Millie, who was always practical. "But I hardly know what to give unless I ask mamma."

"Well, we'll consult her after dinner." The consultation came in due time, and it lasted a long while. They were anxious to give something very nice to some one whom they could really help.

"I have it," exclaimed Leonard at last. "There's Tom, you know, Pa's errand boy. He told me the other day that if he had five dollars to buy books with he could attend evening school all winter."

"That's a splendid idea," said Millie; "we'll give it to him out of our pocket money."

So the gift was decided upon, and, what is more, it was made. Tom went to the evening school and studied the books given by Millie and Leonard. He will probably be better and happier all his life because they went to the Thanksgiving service.

COUSIN LOIS.

That Things Are No Worse, Sire.

FROM the time of our old Revolution,
When we threw off the yoke of the king,
Has descended this phrase to remember,
To remember, to say, and to sing;
'Tis a phrase that is full of a lesson,
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
It can cheer us when days are the darkest:
"That things are no worse, O, my Sire!"

'Twas King George's prime minister said it,
To the King who had questioned in heat,
What he meant by appointing Thanksgiving,
In such times of ill luck and defeat;
"What's the cause for your Day of Thanksgiving,
Tell me, pray," cried the King, in his ire;
Said the Minister, "This is the reason—
That things are no worse, O, my Sire!"

There has nothing come down in the story,
Of the answer returned by the King;
But I think on his throne he sat silent,
And confessed it a sensible thing.
For there's never a burden so heavy
That it might not be heavier still;
There is never so bitter a sorrow,
That the cup could not fuller fill.

And whatever of care or of sadness
Our life and our duties may bring,
There is always the cause for Thanksgiving,
Which the Minister told to the King.
'Tis a lesson to sing and remember;
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
Can cheer us when days are the darkest—
"That things are no worse, O, my Sire!"

The Story of "Wait."

HAS any one ever heard such a name as "Wait?" This is the way in which "Wait" came to be so called.

From the time she was six years old, Jessy Goldsmith has always been what people call a "bookworm,"—in her case, the term having a twofold meaning; for worms are never supposed to run, or in any way to hasten their steps, upon even the most urgent occasion. At all events, when she was summoned, she was never expected to respond within the time given to most little folks to respond to a call.

"Wait a moment" was always the reply which she gave, until finally these words came so readily to her lips that they were spoken half unconsciously. Thus people learned to speak of her as "Wait;" and although she is now a tall girl, and is fast outgrowing—no, conquering—the habit, the name still clings to her. You see how hard it is to lose a name once gained.

Jessy once had to undergo a bitter disappointment, brought on by this want of prompt obedience. Even mamma's patience was at length exhausted; and it was decreed by the family council that under none but the most necessary circumstances should "Wait" be called a second time, and that the reason for the call should not be given until she responded in person.

This was a severe test, for it sometimes disturbed not only "Wait's" own plans, but sometimes her friends had also to suffer. The real trial, however, came one afternoon, when she was promised a trip to Boston with her papa.

"Wait" was intensely interested in one of the pretty new books which had been given her, when the sound of mamma's voice was heard calling, "Come quickly, daughter; I want you." But the daughter's mind was filled with the entrancing story, and mechanically she muttered, "Just wait a moment."

Now, papa had been obliged suddenly to take this trip to Boston, whither "Wait" had long cherished the dream of going; and this, it was thought, would be a good time to gratify her wish. But the little girl's "minute," as usual, was a very long one; and, as papa's time for preparation was short, he was ready before "Wait" appeared.

Mamma's tender heart almost misgave her as she thought of the pain it would give her child to miss this trip; but papa remained firm in his decision that the original rule must be observed. "I will wait five minutes longer," said he, drawing out his watch; "and if she is not here at the end of that time, she must suffer for her dallying."

Forgetting all things, "Wait" read on, until, growing tired of the one position, she rose to change it, when mamma's request rushed through her mind, and she slowly walked down stairs, book in hand, to her mother's room, all too late. When the little girl heard of the pleasant journey which, through her inattention, she had lost, she burst into tears, and, sobbing, threw herself into mamma's arms.

All that day "Wait" was the most miserable of girls; but I think, when the cloud cleared away, sunshine followed, for from that day forward, "Wait" showed signs of amendment.

Several years have passed since then, and "Wait" is wont to say that, when she lost her trip to Boston, she lost also the ready skill of saying "Wait a minute."—Laura M. Freck, in S. S. Times.

My Whistling Neighbor.

(From Moore's Rural New-Yorker of June 22d, 1861.)

WE had moved into a new house, situated about the centre in a row of ten, all run up together in hurried, mushroom fashion, and divided from each other by partitions of brick so thin that sound was only a little deadened in passing through. For the first three or four nights I was unable to sleep, except in snatches, for so many noises came to my ears, originating, apparently, in my own domicile, that anxiety in regard to burglars was constantly excited. Both on the first and second nights I made a journey through the house in the small hours, but found no intruders on my premises. The sounds that disturbed me came from some of my neighbors, who kept later vigils than suited my habits.

'There it is again!" said I, looking up from my paper, as I sat reading on the second day after taking possession of my new home. "That fellow is a nuisance."

"What fellow?" asked my wife, whose countenance showed surprise at the remark. She was either unconscious or unaffected by the circumstance that annoyed my sensitive ears.

"Don't you hear it?" said I.

"Hear what?"

"That everlasting whistle."

"Oh!" A smile played over my wife's face. "Does it annoy you?"

"I can't say that I am particularly annoyed by it yet; but I shall be if it's to go on incessantly. A man whistles for want of thought, and this very fact will—"

"I'm not so sure of that," remarked my wife, interrupting me, "the poet notwithstanding. I would say that he whistles from exuberant feelings. Our neighbor has a sunny temper, no doubt; what, I am afraid, cannot be said of our neighbor on the other side. I've never heard him whistle; but his scolding abilities are good; and, judging from two days' observation, he is not likely to permit them to grow feeble for want of use."

I did not answer, but went on with my reading, silenced, if not reconciled to my whistling neighbor.

Business matters annoyed me through the day, and I felt moody and depressed as I took my course homeward at nightfall. I was not leaving my cares behind me. Before shutting my account books, and locking my fire-proof, I had made up a bundle of troubles to carry away with me, and my shoulder stooped beneath the burden.

I did not bring sunlight into my dwelling as I crossed, with dull, deliberate steps, its threshold. The flying feet that sprung along the hall, and the eager voices that filled, suddenly, the air in a sweet tumult of sound as I entered, were quiet and hushed in a little while. I did not repel my precious ones, for they were very dear to my heart; but birds do not sing joyously except in the sunshine, and my presence had cast a shadow. The songs of my home birds died into mournful chirpings—they sat quiet among the branches. I saw this, and understood the reason. I condemned myself; I reasoned against the folly of bringing worldly cares into the home sanctuary; I endeavored to rise out of my gloomy state. But neither philosophy nor a self-compelling effort was of any avail.

I was sitting, with my hand partly shading my face from the light, still in conflict with myself, when I became conscious of a lifting of the shadows that were around me, and of a freer respiration. The change was slight, but still very perceptible. I was beginning to question as to its cause, when my thought recognized an agency which had been operative through the sense of hearing, though not before externally perceived in consequence of my abstracted state. My neighbor was whistling "Begone, Dull Care!"

Now, in my younger days, I had whistled and sung the air and words of this cheerful old song hundreds of times, and every line was familiar to memory. I listened with pleased interest, for a little while, and then, as my changing state gave power to resolutions quick born of better reason, I said, in my thought, emphatically, as if remanding an evil spirit, "Begone, dull care!" and the fiend left me.

Then I spoke cheerfully, and in a tone of interest to quiet little May, who had walked round me three or four times, wondering in her little heart, no doubt, what held her at a distance from her papa, and who was now seated by her mother, leaning her flaxen head, fluted all over with glossy curls, against her knee. She sprang, at my voice, and was in my lap at a bound. What thrill of pleasure the tight clasp of her arms sent to my heart! Oh, love, thou art full of blessing!

From that moment I felt kinder toward my neighbor. He had done me good—had played before me as David played before Saul, exorcising the evil spirit of discontent. There was no longer a repellent sphere, and soon all my little ones were close around me, and happy as in other times with their father.

After they were all in bed, and I sat alone with my wife, the cares that "infest the day" made a new assault upon me, and vigorously strove to regain their lost empire in my mind. I felt their approaches, and the gradual receding of cheerful thoughts with every advancing step they made. In my struggle to maintain that tranquility which so strengthens the soul for work and duty, I arose and walked the floor. My wife looked up to me with inquiry on her face. Then she let her eyes fall upon her needlework, and as I glanced toward her at every turn in my walk, I saw an expression of tender concern on her lips. She understood that I was not at ease in my mind, and the knowledge troubled her.

"How wrong in me," I said, in self-rebuke, "thus to let idle brooding over mere outside things, which such brooding can in no way effect, trouble the peace of home;" and I made a new effort to rise again into a sunnier region. But the fiend had me in his clutches again, and I could not release myself. Now it was that my David came anew to my relief. Suddenly his clear notes rang out in the air, "Away with Melancholy."

I cannot tell which worked the instant revulsion of feeling that came—the cheerful air, the words of the song which were called to remembrance by the air, or the associations of by-gone years that were revived. But the spell was potent and complete. I was myself again.

During the evening the voice of my wife broke out several times into snatches of song—a thing quite unusual of late, for life's sober realities had taken the music from her as well as from her husband. We were growing graver every day. It was pleasant to hear her flute-tones again, very pleasant, and my ear harkened lovingly. The cause of this fitful warbling I recognized each time as the notes died away. They were responsive to our neighbor.

I did not then remark upon the circumstance. One reason of this lay in the fact that I had spoken lightly of our neighbor's whistling propensity, which struck me in the beginning as vulgar; and I did not care to acknowledge myself so largely his debtor as I really was.

We were in our bedroom, and about retiring for the night, when loud voices, as if in strife, came discordantly through the thin party walls, from our neighbors on the other side. Something had gone wrong there, and angry passions were in the ascendant.

"How very disagreeable!" I remarked.

"The man's a brute!" said my wife, emphatically. "He does nothing, it seems to me, but wrangle in his family. Pity that he hadn't something of the pleasant temper of our neighbor on the other side."

"That is a more agreeable sound, I must confess," was my answer, as the notes of "What Fairy-like Music Steals over the Sea" rose sweetly on the air.

"Far more agreeable," returned my wife.

"He plays well on his instrument," I said, smiling. My ear was following the notes in pleased recognition. We stood listening until our neighbor passed to another air, set to Mrs. Heman's beautiful words, "Come to the Sunset Tree." To a slow, soft, tender measure the notes fell, yet still we heard them with singular distinctness through the intervening wall, just a little muffled, but sweeter for the obstruction.

"The day is past and gone,
The woodman's axe lies free,
And the reaper's work is done."

My wife recalled these lines from her memory, repeating them in a subdued, tranquilizing tone. The air was still sounding in our ears, but we no longer recognized its impression on the external senses. It had done its work of recalling the beautiful Evening Hymn of the Switzer, and we repeated to each other verse after verse.

"Sweet is the hour of rest,
Pleasant the wood's low sigh,
And the gleaming of the west,
And the turf whereon we lie.
When the burden and the heat
Of labor's task are o'er,
And kindly voices greet
The loved one at the door."

To which I added:

"But rest, more sweet and still
Than ever nightfall gave,
Our longing hearts shall fill
In the world beyond the grave.
There shall no tempest blow,
No scorching noontide heat;
There shall be no more snow,
No weary, wandering feet;
And we lift our trusting eyes
From the hills our fathers trod,
To the quiet of the skies—
To the Sabbath of our God."

All was now still on both sides. The harsh discord of our scolding neighbor had ceased, and our whistling neighbor had warbled his good-night melody, which, like a pleasant flower growing near an unsightly object, and interposing a veil of beauty, had removed it from our consciousness.

It was a long time since I had felt so peaceful on retiring as when my head went down upon its pillow, thanks to my light-hearted neighbor, at whose whistling propensities I was inclined in the beginning to be annoyed. But for him I should have gone to rest with the harsh discord of my scolding neighbor's voice in my ears, and been ill at ease with myself and the world. On what seeming trifles hang our states of mind! A word, a look, a tone of music, a discordant jar, will bring light or shadow, smiles or tears.

On the next morning, while dressing myself, thought reached forward over the day's anxieties, and care began drawing her sombre curtains around me. My neighbor was stirring also, and, like the awaking bird, tuneful in sweet matins. "Day on the Mountains," rang out cheerily, followed by "Dear Summer Morn," winding off with "Begone, Dull Care!" and the merry laughter of a happy child which had sprung into his arms, and was being smothered with kisses.

The cloud that was gathering on my brow passed away, and I met my wife and children at the breakfast table with pleasant smiles.

In a few days I ceased to notice the whistling of my neighbor. It continued as usual, but had grown to be such a thing of course as not to be an object of thought. But the effect remained, showing itself in a gradual restoration of that cheerfulness which care, and work, and brooding anxiety about worldly things are so apt to produce. The "voice of music," which had been almost dumb in my wife for a long period, was gradually restored. Old familiar ditties would break suddenly from her throat as she sat sewing, and I would often hear her singing again, from room to room, as in the sunnier days of our spring-time. As for myself, scarcely an evening passed in which I was not betrayed into beating time with my foot to "Auld Lang Syne," "Happy Land," "Comin' through the Rye," or "Hail Columbia," in response to my neighbor's cheery whistle. Our children also caught the infection, and would commence singing on the instant our neighbor tuned his pipes. Verily he was our benefactor—the harping David to our Saul!

"You live at No. 510, I think," said a gentleman whose face was familiar, though I was not able to call his name. We were sitting side by side in the cars.

I answered in the affirmative.

"So I thought," he replied. "I live at 514—second door east."

"Mr. Gordon."

"Yes, sir; that is my name. Pleasant houses, but mere shells," said he. Then, with a look of disgust on his face, "Doesn't that whistling fellow between us annoy you terribly? I've got so out of all patience that I shall either move or silence him. Whistle, whistle, whistle, from morning till night. Pah! I always detested whistling. It's a sign of no brains. I've written him a note twice, but failed to send either time; it isn't well to quarrel with a neighbor if you can help it."

"It doesn't annoy me at all," I answered. "Indeed, I rather like it."

"You do? Well, that is singular! Just what my wife says."

"First-rate for the blue devils, I find. I'm indebted to our whistling friend for sundry favors in this direction."

My new acquaintance looked at me curiously.

"You're not in earnest," said he, a half-amused smile breaking through the unamiable expression which his face had assumed.

"Altogether in earnest; and I beg of you not to send him that note. So your wife is not annoyed?"

"Not she."

"Is she musical?" I inquired.

"She was; but of late years life has been rather a serious matter with us, and her singing birds have died, or lost the heart for music."

"The history of many other lives," said I.

The man sighed faintly.

"Has there been any recent change?" I ventured to inquire.

"In what respect?" he asked.

"Has there been no voice from the singing birds?"

A new expression came suddenly into the man's face.

"Why, yes," he answered, "now that I think of it. There has been some low, fitful warblings. Only last evening the voice of my wife stole out, as if half afraid, and trembled a little while on the words of an old song."

"The air of which our neighbor was whistling at the time," said I.

"Right, as I live!" was my companion's exclamation, after a pause, slapping his hand on his knee. I could hardly help smiling at the look of wonder, amusement and conviction, that blended on his face.

"I wouldn't send that note," said I, meaningly.

"No, hang me if I do! I must study this case. I'm something of a philosopher, you must know. If our neighbor can awaken the singing birds in the heart of my wife, he may whistle till the crack of doom without hindrance from me. I'm obliged to you for the suggestion.

A week afterward I met him again.

"What about the singing birds?" I asked, smiling.

"All alive again, thank God!" He answered with a heartiness of manner that caused me to look narrowly into his face. It wore a better expression than when I observed it last.

"Then you didn't send that note?"

"No, sir. Why, since I saw you I've actually taken to whistling and humming old tunes again, and you can't tell how much better it makes me feel. And the children are becoming as merry and musical as crickets. Our friend's whistle sets them all agoing, like the first signal-warble of a bird at daydawn that awakens the woods to melody."

We were on our way homeward, and parted at my own door. As I entered, "Home, Sweet Home" was pulsing in tender harmonies on the air. I stood still and listened until tears fell over my cheeks. The singing birds were alive again in the heart of my wife also, and I said, "Thank God!" as warmly as my neighbor had uttered the words a little while before.

TUESDAY, Nov. 23.

IT was reported about a fortnight ago that very heavy monsoon rains had fallen in India. We have seen no verification of the report. The rain was said to be the heaviest of many years, amounting to about 90 inches. That ordinarily ensures heavy crops in India, which will be harvested early in our spring. But prices have been steadily rising in European markets. All were reported firm yesterday, as they have been for some days, with an upward tendency. Exporters here have been buying more freely. Freight room is somewhat limited. The visible supply of grain east of the Rocky Mountains in the United States and Canada was reported yesterday to be 59,551,351 bushels of wheat, 12,289,408 of corn, and 5,650,746 of oats, being an increase for the week of 1,228,803 bushels of wheat, a decrease of 807,305 bushels of corn, and an increase of 1,146 bushels of oats. Quotations for December delivery were yesterday: Wheat here, 86 cents, in Chicago, 74 7-8; corn here, 46 3-4, in Chicago, 36 3-4; oats here, 33 3-4, in Chicago, 26 3-8. Wheat sold for cash here yesterday: No. 1 red, 89; No. 2 red, 86; State white, 85; No. 1 hard Duluth, 91. Exporters were said to have bought 320,000 bushels. Hay was firm, and choice timothy brought 80 to 90 cents; No. 1, 75 to 80; clover mixed, 60 to 65. Long rye straw was quoted at 65 to 70; oat, 35 to 40. Cotton closed at: November, 9.2-3; December, 9.5-6; January, 9.15-16; February, 9.26-27.

The Stock Market has been lively, especially in Southern railway stocks, which have received unusual attention. Railway earnings continue satisfactory. The list generally is firm and the demand good. Low priced securities have had their turn and have been picked up by speculative buyers. Investment securities are held very firmly.

The Associated Banks reported for the week: Loans reduced $113,300, an increase of $2,704,500 in specie, of $116,000 in legal tenders, of $3,127,400 in deposits, and an addition of $2,038,650 to the surplus of reserve, making it $9,930,000. Call loans were made at from 3 to 7 per cent., the average being a fraction above 5 per cent. On commercial paper the rate was 5 1-2 to 6 1-2 per cent. The steamers brought for the week nearly $2,000,000 in gold. Yesterday the import amounted to $529,400. The import from the middle of August has been about $19,800,000, against an export of specie since January 1 of $46,269,966, some of it silver, and the larger part previous to July 1.

Imports of merchandise at this port for the week were valued at $7,320,431, and exports at $8,257,483. For the year thus far imports at this port amount to $380,607,816, against $341,420,964 during the same time last year, and exports to $282,567,751, against $280,112,745 in 1885. Foreign exchange sold yesterday at $4.81 1-2 for sixty day bills and $4.85 for demand for sterling. The reduction of National Bank circulation, by the redemption of bonds, continues. The silver dollar is worth 79 1-2 cents as bullion.

Transactions in real estate in the county towns of Kings County, Long Island, have been unusually large for a month or two.

Expose of That Pretended Public Investigation of the Qualities of the Baking Powders.

It is no new thing with the Royal Baking Powder Company to publish in the newspapers reading notice advertisements which have the appearance of emanating from the editor's pen.

Its most recent effort is an article from the Albany Evening Journal giving a pretended investigation, as if made by the Journal, of the qualities of the baking powders. The following, from a later issue of the same paper, (August 27, 1886,) so plainly stamps the whole thing as simply an advertising dodge of huge proportions that we think the public entitled to the benefit of the expose, and accordingly give it below:

"The Journal has printed analyses and reports of various baking powders as reading notices or advertisements. It has not undertaken to say of its own knowledge which is the best powder in the market. Consumers must decide for themselves."

This piece of ingenious advertising on the part of the Royal Baking Powder Company may have had its origin in the evident disappointment of that Company with its extravagant but fruitless advertising efforts to beguile the public into believing that the cream of tartar used in other baking powders contains a large percentage of tartrate of lime, when it is a fact, and well known to the commercial world, that all the refiners who supply this country with cream of tartar are, and have been for a long time, in a combination under an agreement between them to produce only strictly pure, or ninety-nine per cent., goods.

The cream of tartar used in Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder is refined by a new process which frees it entirely from tartrate of lime and every impurity, and is obtained in the pure crystals and ground in our own factory; the bicarbonate of soda is prepared expressly for us; and to ensure uniform and absolute purity of our baking powder all the ingredients are subjected to searching chemical analyses, and none used unless proved to be perfectly pure.

Appreciating the fact that consumers have a right to know what they are using as food, we have for many years made known to the public all the ingredients of our powder. Cleveland's Superior Baking Powder is made only of strictly pure grape cream of tartar, bicarbonate of soda, and a small portion of flour used as a preservative, and does not contain ammonia, alum, lime, acid phosphates, or any adulteration whatever.

Has the Royal Baking Powder Company, with its much advertising, ever informed the housekeepers of the country all that enters into the composition of its powder? Or has it ever published a word openly in defence of the use of ammonia in baking powder? Information on these points might enable the public to form an intelligent opinion in regard to the merits of this much mooted question of baking powder supremacy, and we would have no misgivings as to the result.

The First Sign

Of failing health, whether in the form of Night Sweats and Nervousness, or in a sense of General Weariness and Loss of Appetite, should suggest the use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. This preparation is most effective for giving tone and strength to the enfeebled system, promoting the digestion and assimilation of food, restoring the nervous forces to their normal condition, and for purifying, enriching and vitalizing the blood.

Failing Health.

Ten years ago my health began to fail. I was troubled with a distressing Cough, Night Sweats, Weakness, and Nervousness. I tried various remedies prescribed by different physicians, but became so weak that I could not go up stairs without stopping to rest. My friends recommended me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla, which I did, and I am now as healthy and strong as ever.—Mrs. E. L. Williams, Alexandria, Minn.

I have used Ayer's Sarsaparilla, in my family, for Scrofula, and know, if it is taken faithfully, that it will thoroughly eradicate this terrible disease. I have also prescribed it as a tonic, as well as an alterative, and must say that I honestly believe it to be the best blood medicine ever compounded.—W. F. Fowler, D. D. S., M. D., Greenville, Tenn.

Dyspepsia Cured.

It would be impossible for me to describe what I suffered from Indigestion and Headache up to the time I began taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla. I was under the care of various physicians and tried a great many kinds of medicines, but never obtained more than temporary relief. After taking Ayer's Sarsaparilla for a short time, my headache disappeared, and my stomach performed its duties more perfectly. To-day my health is completely restored.—Mary Harley, Springfield, Mass.

I have been greatly benefited by the prompt use of Ayer's Sarsaparilla. It tones and invigorates the system, regulates the action of the digestive and assimilative organs, and vitalizes the blood. It is, without doubt, the most reliable blood purifier yet discovered.—H. D. Johnson, 383 Atlantic ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Church.

The Martyrs.

BY MARTIN LUTHER.

FLUNG to the heedless winds,
Or on the waters cast,
The martyrs' ashes, watched,
Shall gathered be at last;
And from that scattered dust,
Around us and abroad,
Shall spring a plenteous seed
Of witnesses for God.

The Father has received
Their latest living breath;
And vain is Satan's boast
Of victory in their death;
Still, still, though dead, they speak,
And, trumpet-tongued, proclaim
To many a wakening land
The one availing Name.

The Past Forty Years.

IN his review of the events of the forty years covered by his pastorate in Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. R. S. Storrs presented the following graphic and hopeful summary of The Movements of Religious Thought.

It is perhaps yet more appropriate on an occasion like this to notice the swift currents and swirls of religious thought, in Christian lands, in the midst of whose vehement surges we have stood, and by which the moral history of the time has been largely affected. We have seen on the one hand the old scepticism, which never dies, on the other hand a ritualism —exacting and haughty in its Roman exhibition, clamorous and conceited in the Protestant imitation —facing and alternately exciting each other, each arrogant, each ambitious, and neither, perhaps, surpassing the other in dislike to the truth as we have held it. In Protestant communities have been manifold influences tending to a wide unsettling of belief. In the Papal communion tendencies working toward stricter definition and completer development have issued in the action of the Vatican Council ascribing infallible authority to the Pontiff. No intelligent community can have remained unaffected by the alternating swing of such persistent and imperious movements.

The German thought, often aggressively rationalistic, whose influence was comparatively limited in this country forty years ago, has made a constantly wider appeal to the American mind, and is perhaps as active as ever, and as effective, in the influence which it exerts to-day. It was fondly thought by some sceptical people that Dr. Strauss, whose Life of Christ, representing the mythical theory of the Gospels, was first presented to English readers through a translation in 1846, had delivered the New Testament to death and dust, with the religion which it contains. But somehow the New Testament was the book which survived, while to think of his now is like remembering a ghost. Many other volumes in the same line of thought have followed his, from German, Dutch and English writers, but none I think more elaborate, perhaps none more effective, than that which gave him his rather brief and dreary fame.

Meantime, of course, philosophy, archæology, natural science, have pursued their own paths, in indifference to Christianity, and though without purposed hostility to it have not unfrequently propounded theories essentially destructive of what in it is radical and vital.

At the same time, however, it is to be said that the simultaneous defences of Christianity have not been inferior in number or weight to the attacks made upon it, that earnest and searching evangelical thought has been immensely indebted to the diligent labor of German scholars, and also of French, represented in histories, commentaries, profound philosophical, philological, and archæological investigations; and that more has been written ably, learnedly, with the eloquence of adoring affection, setting forth the Divine person and life of the Master of Christendom, in these forty years than in any or all preceding periods. On the whole, one may with confidence affirm that the foreign element as now domesticated in our literature, has been helpful rather than hostile to the Gospel; while many things indicate that more and more it is to bring to the Master of Christendom spices and riches of myrrh and gold.

Counter-Currents in Spiritual Tendency.

We are more intimately connected in this country with the English than with the French or the German thought; and the frequent reactions and sharp collisions there appearing have probably had more general reflection on this side of the ocean than anywhere else outside of England. When this church was organized, the wide and energetic movement toward Romanism among those who had been leaders in the Anglican communion was in eager process. The series of Oxford Tracts for the Times had recently been finished. In 1850 was pronounced by the Privy Council the famous Gorham decision, which seemed to many to deal destructively with the entire sacramental system of the Anglican Church. Such divergent or opposing currents of thought, simultaneously appearing, are, of course, not infrequent. But in an exhibition less conspicuous, on an area more limited, such antitheses of opinion have in our time appeared in the English Church with a distinctness and a force which we do not forget.

I need not multiply illustrations of the counter-currents in spiritual tendency, and in the religious thought which declares it, which have been ceaselessly eddying around us for forty years; nor of the contradictory opinions, differing from the Gospel as we apprehend that, and often fiercely hostile to it which have reverberated in books or been popularized in journals, or more or less successfully thrust into pulpits. But the facts are also gratefully to be noticed that in the various evangelical communions the tendency has been vigorous toward a more vital and intimate sense of their practical unity and toward co-operation in Christian endeavor wherever the way to this has been open; that their pervasive missionary spirit has become continually more inspiring, and has given to all their organized movement new courage and hope; and that the theology obtaining among them, not losing its majesty or the sharpness of its defining lines, has steadily become more Christo-centric, and has been interpreted with increasing distinctness in the line of its profound spiritual significance, rather than in that of traditional exposition or a formal, constructive logic.

It has been stated, with I think substantial correctness, that including all evangelical denominations, there were in this country in 1850, 43,072 local churches, with 3,529,987 communicants; and that in 1880, thirty years after, the churches numbered 97,090, with 10,065,963 communicants. Such a vast and swift advance surely and wholly contradicts the notion, sometimes expressed, that the ancient grand interpretation of the Gospel is losing its hold on the eager and daring American mind. With a progress at all corresponding to this, in the thirty years to come, the result will be one to give to the continent a Christian renown, and to offer the most significant promise for the victorious advance of the Gospel in all the earth.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

Dec. 5th.—"Worshipping God and the Lamb."—Rev. 5 : 1–14.

Golden Text.—"Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." Rev. 5 : 13.

Central Truth.—"I and my Father are one."—John 10 : 30.

Introduction.

CHAPTERS two and three of this book contain the epistles to the seven churches, messages of correction and encouragement. Chapter fourth records the vision which John saw of the throne of God, surrounded by the living creatures and the four and twenty elders. This vision is to be regarded as the centre of all the visions of this wonderful book. The truth that God reigns is declared on every page and in almost every line. Chapter fifth begins the unfolding of the Divine purposes in history. Providence is represented as a sealed book, opened and interpreted by the Lamb.

The Lesson.

I. THE SEALED BOOK.—VS. 1–4.

V. 1—"And I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book." As suggested in the introduction, this book represents the purposes of God in Providence. It was seen by the Apostle in the right hand of God to indicate that He holds all forces that combine to make human history under His own control. "Written within and on the back side." This indicates that the matter contained in this book was very full, covering as it did the details of universal history from the time of the vision until the end of days. "Sealed with seven seals." This indicates the inscrutable nature of God's purposes, which become known to us only by their fulfilment, or as He is pleased to give us hints here and there of that which shall come to pass.

V. 2.—"Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof?" The angels as well as men desire to look into these things. This proclamation is a challenge intended to show that there is but one who can know fully and reveal clearly the will of the Most High.

V. 3.—"No man.... was able to open the book, neither to look thereon." No mere man, even though he had been among the redeemed as long as Abel, the proto-martyr, could assume to touch this book of God's hidden purposes.

V. 4.—"And I wept much." The prophet, led by preceding revelations to expect still fuller disclosures in connection with this sealed book, is bitterly disappointed by the impossibility of finding any man who is worthy to become God's interpreter.

II. THE LAMB IN THE MIDST OF THE THRONE.—VS 5–10.

V. 5.—"And one of the elders said unto me, Weep not." God had not brought His servant up to this point of expectation to disappoint him. "The Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book." He who on earth claimed oneness with His Father, and who has in measure revealed Him to men, is continuing that work in Providence, unfolding more and more fully the will of God.

V. 6.—"And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts." As the very centre of this magnificent assembly. "Stood a Lamb as it had been slain." As Jesus was first made known to John as the Lamb of God, so He appears to him now under that form, as a victim that had suffered as a sacrifice. "Having seven horns and seven eyes." These represent the plenitude of wisdom and power with which He is endowed as Redeemer. "Which are the seven Spirits of God." As in our last lesson, we are to take this expression as referring to the fulness of the Holy Spirit's nature and not to any plurality of Spirits.

V. 7.—"And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne." He needed no vouchers other than the marks of His crucifixion. He came forward in quiet assertion of His blood-bought right to be the revealer of God to man, as well as the intercessor before God in man's behalf.

V. 8.—"And when he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb." These represent all the dominion of God. "Having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors." They stand before the throne, and prostrate themselves before the Lamb, as the representatives of all the redeemed.

V. 9.—"And they sung a new song." As God's plans draw nearer to completion, the people of God have more abundant causes for joy and thankfulness, and now, when the Lamb appears to unfold all remaining mysteries, they find occasion and inspiration for a new song, such as neither earth nor heaven has heard before. "Thou art worthy . . . . for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God." The sacrifice of Christ is made the basis of His praise by all the universe. That He had given Himself to death for our redemption is the reason for His exaltation as the Son of Man.

V. 10.—"And hast made us unto our God kings and priests." This is the same expression that occurred in the former lesson and refers to the two sides of our relation to the kingdom of God,—subjects, yet rulers. "And we shall reign on the earth." When and how this reign of the saints shall take place we cannot tell, but we have the promise of Christ Himself that "the meek shall inherit the earth."

III. THE WORSHIP OF THE FATHER AND THE LAMB —VS. 11–14.

V. 11.—Immediately upon this ascription of praise to the Lamb by these representative beings, there arose a mighty chorus from all the dominion of God. The numbers used to suggest the multitude of this host of worshippers is simply a periphrasis for infinity.

V. 12.—"Saying with a loud voice." Their praise was hearty and outspoken. Their hearts were full of long-suppressed expectancy and hope deferred, and now that all waiting was soon to be at an end, they burst forth in a rapturous song of praise. "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." He who had been despised and rejected of men, the butt of scoffers, and the sport of cruel persecutors, now receives the homage of the world, and of heaven itself. The seven gifts which are mentioned suggest the complete perfection and prerogative of God.

V. 13.—"And every creature." Not only the living creatures, the attendants upon the King of Heaven; not only the angel hosts, God's ever ready servants; not only the elders, representing the redeemed Church of God, but all creation joins in this shout of praise. This is the moment for which creation has so long groaned, waiting for the redemption; to wit, the adoption of the sons of God.

V. 14.—"And the four beasts said Amen." As these began the praise which angels and men and lower creatures took up, so now they close the grand hallelujah chorus with a hearty Amen.

Lessons for To-day.

1. God holds the destiny of men in His hand.

2. We must wait God's time and mode of unfolding His purposes.

3. Jesus Christ is the only authorized interpreter of God's ways

4. Jesus is unfolding the hidden things of God in experience and history.

5. We ought to catch the spirit of the new song even while on earth.

6. We may do much by faithful serving to hasten this triumphal day.

7. Let our actions be in accord with our words of praise.

8. Jesus is worthy now to receive our full and hearty allegiance.

The Year's Gray Hair.

THE year is old, I hear them say.
And that is true; for I found to-day,
Out in the pasture over there,
Ever so much of the year's gray hair.

'Twas scattered about on the crispy moss
As soft as silk, and as fine as floss.
I felt so sorry—oh, dear! oh, dear!
When I thought of the pretty young new year.

I thought of the "pussies," like yellow down;
And the alder tassels, fine and brown;
And the violet brooch by the young year worn
Before her dresses were soiled and torn.

I thought of her daisy cloak—oh, fie!
What a pity she had to lay it by!
And the red and white roses—why just to part
With them was enough to break her heart.

But now she is old, for I saw to-day
Signs of it all along the way;
And the prickly thistles have caught—see there!
Lock after lock of her poor gray hair.

Those Three Cents.

WE want to tell you a story we heard the other day. It is a true story from beginning to end. A clergyman told it, and told it about himself.

He said that when he was a little fellow he was playing one winter day with some of his boy friends, when three cents, belonging to one of them, suddenly disappeared in the snow. Try as they would they could not find them, and the boys finally gave up the search, much to the disappointment of the one who owned them. "The next day," said the clergyman who was telling the story, "I chanced to be going by the spot, when I spied the three coins we had been looking for. The snow which had covered them the day before had melted, and there they lay in full view. I seized them and put them in my pocket. I thought of the candy I could buy with them, and how fortunate I was to have found them; and when conscience would not keep still, but insisted on telling me what it thought of me, and above all, what God thought of me, I just told it to be quiet, and tried to satisfy it by saying that Charlie B—— had given up thinking about his three cents by this time, and that the one who found them had the right to them.

"Well, to make a long story short, I spent the money, ate my candy, and thought that was the end of the whole matter. But I was never more mistaken. Years passed on. I grew from a boy into a man, but every now and then 'those three cents' would come into my mind. I couldn't get rid of them. They would come. However, in spite of them, I had all along a strong desire to be a good boy, and to grow up to be a good man—a Christian man. This desire grew stronger and stronger, for God never left me, and so I gave myself to Him, and finally, when I grew up, became a clergyman. Now perhaps you may think my trouble was over. But no; every now and then 'those three cents' would come into my mind as before. Especially when I would try to get nearer to God, there were 'those three cents' right in the way.

"At last I saw what God had all along been trying to make me see, that I must tell Charlie B—— that I had taken them! To be sure, he was a man by this time, and so was I, but no matter. God told me, as plainly as I am telling you now, that till I had done this He could not bless me. So then and there I sat down and wrote to Charlie, inclosing in my note twenty-five cents—the three cents with interest. Since then I have had peace, and God has blessed me."

Boys and girls, a very little thing may come between you and God. What are your "three cents?" God will show you if He has not already. Don't ever let any sin, however small, come between you and Him. Confess it right away, and He will make you clean. You should try so to live that you may be always sure of the smile of Jesus. Then you will be happy, and then you can be blessed.—Parish Visitor.

How Scotland Was Saved.

LITTLE Minnie, in her eagerness after flowers, had wounded her hand on the sharp, prickly thistle. This made her cry with pain at first, and pout with vexation afterwards.

"I do wish there was no such thing as thistle in the world," she said, pettishly.

"And yet the Scottish nation thinks so much of it, that they engrave it on the national arms," said her mother.

"It is the last flower that I should pick out," said Minnie. "I am sure they could have found a great many nicer ones, even among the weeds."

"But this thistle did them such good service once," said her mother, "that they learned to esteem it very highly. One time the Danes invaded Scotland, and they prepared to make an attack on a sleeping garrison. So they crept along barefooted as still as possible, until they were almost on the spot. Just at that moment a barefooted soldier stepped on a great thistle, and the hurt made him utter a sharp, shrill cry of pain. The sound awoke the sleepers, and each man sprang to his arms. They fought with great bravery, and the invaders were driven back with much loss. So, you see, the thistle saved Scotland, and ever since it has been placed on their seals as their national flower."

"Well, I never could suspect that so small a thing could save a nation," said Minnie, thoughtfully.—The Young Churchman.

The Experience of an Eminent Jurist.

THE attention of social scientists has long been called to the increasing fatality among America's brain-workers.

When brought to a full conviction of their increasing dangers, their souls stir within them an ardent desire for help and relief. The tendency oft times is to grasp at anything that promises restoration, and a thousand and one things are offered, but all seem doomed to disappoint, for medicine can offer no cure. A change of life and habits oft affords nature opportunity to recuperate, and the individual may go on for a time; but with the aid of a true restorer to the nervous system, if there be a good foundation it may be again built up, sometimes even where habits and life appear against them. The following is peculiarly a case in point:

"REVITALIZED."

June 8, 1886.

"I am not only pleased, I am delighted with the Treatment. The third day after beginning to use it, to my utter surprise and inexpressible joy, that terrible 'sinking feeling' in the pit of my stomach, and a week later that twin curse, the dull pain above the eyes, both of which constituted the burden of my complaint when I consulted you, have disappeared and I have not been troubled with either since. It is wonderful!

"I experienced no particular sensation in using the Treatment; made some blunders, was somewhat irregular, and since I began have been severely taxed both mentally and physically; notably in the trial of a $200,000 will case, which lasted eight days, and yet with it all I feel like a new man. Nor have I changed my habits in the least. I have smoked the usual number of cigars and punished the usual amount of tobacco, besides indulging in coffee in the morning and tea in the evening, and eating what I liked. I repeat it, it is wonderful! The benefits I have received will be worth many hundred times their cost. I feel 'revitalized,' indeed I can hardly realize, the change has been so sudden, that I am now writing in this cheerful strain, am the same miserable creature who called upon you less than a month ago."

July 19, 1886: "It is now two months since I began the use of your Home Treatment; I still have on hand a small quantity of the Oxygen aqua, and the blue bottle is about one-eighth full, which shows probably that I have not strictly followed directions; and yet without the least change in habits or diet I find myself a new man."

A recent writer in the Independent says: "There is a strong tendency with the weak-minded to magnify their own diseases and cures. I may belong to this class, but fear of being so labeled will not deter me from giving this unsolicited testimonial. I am sincerely grateful for what you have done for me, and take this method of testifying my gratitude.

"When two months ago I called at your office, an entire stranger, I was suffering from two causes, a dull, heavy feeling over and about the eyes, and a sinking sensation in the pit of the stomach. I had suffered from these causes, it is safe to say, for twenty years, and they were the twin curses of my existence. It is impossible to convey to any one who has never been thus afflicted the slightest conception of what I suffered. I do not refer to the physical pain, for that was very slight, but to the mental agony. You did not tell me that I was the victim of dyspepsia, but I suspect I was. At least, what Henry Ward Beecher says of dyspepsia is equally applicable to a person suffering as I did; to wit, that it is utterly impossible for such a person to be a true Christian.

"It may be that my suffering was purely imaginary, if there can be such a thing as distinguished from the real article, but if it was then my mind was diseased, and all the more credit to you for restoring it to its normal condition.

"As before reported, the trouble about the eyes in my case disappeared the third day, I think, after I began the use of your Treatment, and the stomach trouble not over four days later. You gave me no assurance of such speedy results, and I was as much surprised as delighted when they came. Indeed it was with considerable difficulty that I brought myself to a full realization of the facts. I have only to add that since the first disappearance of my troubles they have not reappeared. What the effect of a discontinuance of the Treatment may be remains to be seen, but I have the utmost faith in your printed statements that the results of the use of Compound Oxygen are permanent."

August 25, 1886: "It is now more than a month since I stopped the Home Treatment, and I am happy to say that I have had no return of my old trouble. It is wonderful—I had almost said miraculous. Scientific chemists and professors of colleges may talk as they please, about Compound Oxygen being a 'perfectly inert substance,' but they never will convince me.

"You ask about the constipation, and the nervous tremulousness. Well, I think they are both somewhat better, although they are by no means cured. It would be strange if they were. In the first place they were not the troubles which I consulted you about; besides, I think the constipation is inherited, and as for the nervousness, that is no doubt due to the use of tobacco, tea and coffee, and to past indiscretions. Indeed, the most remarkable thing to me about the cure in my case, is that it was effected without the slightest change in habits or diet."

Any person desiring to know more of this jurist's experience will be cheerfully gratified by him, and his name and address will be given to any upon application to DRS. STARKEY & PALEN.

If you are suffering from any chronic disease about which you are growing discouraged, such as Pulmonary trouble, Catarrh, Bronchitis, Neuralgia, Rheumatism, nervous prostration, etc., send a statement of your condition to DRS. STARKEY & PALEN, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, and get their opinion as to the value of Compound Oxygen in your case. It will cost you nothing.

Dr. S. E. SYLVESTER, Portland, Me., says: "I have used it in nervous debility with most satisfactory results."

Catarrh Cured

Catarrh is a very prevalent disease, with distressing and offensive symptoms. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives ready relief and speedy cure, from the fact it acts through the blood, and thus reaches every part of the system.

"I suffered with catarrh fifteen years. Took Hood's Sarsaparilla and I am not troubled any with catarrh, and my general health is much better." I. W. LILLIS, Postal Clerk Chicago & St. Louis Railroad.

"I suffered with catarrh 6 or 8 years; tried many wonderful cures, inhalers, etc., spending nearly one hundred dollars without benefit. I tried Hood's Sarsaparilla, and was greatly improved." M. A. ABBEY, Worcester, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Leafless.

"IN THE CERTAIN HOPE OF A GLORIOUS RESURRECTION."

LO, how yon maple putteth by Her robes of splendor—laying down
Meek as a child, her glory crown;—
Without a murmer or a sigh,
Relinquishing her pomp and state;—
Bemoaning not her vanished charms,
Her hapless lot, her empty arms,
Content, she bows to meet her fate.
Though Winter slay, and frosts benumb,
Still in her very scars is found,
The promise of all Springs to come;—
Where severed sprays have left a wound,
On every stripped, despoiled bough,
Lo, next year's leafage bourgeons now!

Oh, for the wisdom well to learn
The lesson which, undowered with speech
Yon leafless maple yet doth teach.
When Autumn's fires to ashes burn,
And stripped she stands, bereft, forlorn,—
Nor hope, nor courage she abates,
But meekly in sure hope awaits
A joyful resurrection morn.
What matter Death's grim signs to her—
The winding sheet, the gloom, the chill,—
Who feels at root her pulses stir
With life unquenched, unconquered still?
Oh, for the grace to ponder well,
All that the leafless maples tell!

Deacon D.'s Text.

GOOD old Deacon D., in one of our interior towns, came late in life into the Master's service, but he came with his whole heart. His had been a hard-worked boyhood, intent on struggling up through all the disabilities of ignorance and poverty. He won success and a fine business, and one blessed day he found in his hands a still better possession—the wonderful pearl of great price. It was marvelous how it sent a new life everywhere through his whole nature. Thrifty he must and did remain, and his business was a prosperous one; but somehow, in various ways and in all ways, the public came to know that his business methods and aspirations had changed. If this sketch were to give his real name, it would be found among some of the most signal and sacred facts of benevolent and religious gift-making in the last third of a century.

But the good deacon found, as others have done before him, that there are some losses and neglects in life that later good intents cannot quite repair. It was impossible to make good the defects of his earlier life, into which never entered any recognition of God's Word, or heed for the Master's service. He loved the Bible in this later life into which he had come, and he went into Sunday-school work for the first time at an age when too many are prone to deem themselves exempt. His heart was full when, in tribute to his faithfulness and ardent piety, he was chosen superintendent, and entered upon his duties.

A few Sabbaths later came the Sunday-school concert, at which he was for the first time to officiate. He made a special request that every teacher and pupil should be ready with a verse of Scripture. The occasion came in one of the closing hours of a golden summer Sabbath afternoon. The school was out in full numbers, and silence fell upon them as Deacon D. from the platform rose to lead off with his verse. And this was his utterance: "If any man says I love God, he is a liar."

If the silence was hushed before, it became appalling now, in the astonishment of the listeners. What could it mean? Did good Deacon D. retract and repudiate his Christian faith and living? He himself seemed strangely confused and distressed, and by a violent effort cleared his throat for another delivery, as follows: "No; that is not quite it, children. I meant to say, 'If any man says he loves God, he is a liar.'"

This was worse and worse, for in the bold repudiation of faith and love in the first utterance, Deacon D. only seemed to speak for himself. Now he assumed to speak for "any man," and, of course, every man. The listeners marvelled at what was to come next. It came in the shape of a short and telling sermon from the sore mangling of a text so familiar that all readers of the Congregationalist have already recognized it here. Deacon D., with tears in his eyes and tears in his voice, raised his hand with an earnest gesture and said: "Children, it is of no use. That is not my text, and now I cannot repeat my text. It has gone out of my mind, though I knew it well when I came into this room. Children, let me tell you this, as a solemn truth, that, if you wish to commit to memory God's Holy Word, you must do it while you are young. You cannot do it when you are old."

The grass has grown for years on the grave of Deacon D., and yet his text is a memory unfading among numbers who were boys and girls in his Sunday-school, and who have impressed upon Sunday-schools and Sunday-school classes of their own the story of that text, and the excellent bit of doctrine struck out like a shining spark in his failure to remember his verse.—H. M. S., in the Congregationalist.

JACKSON.—In this city, on Friday, Nov. 12, Maria (Miller) Jackson, relict of Henry Jackson, in the 80th year of her age.

SEABURY.—On Wednesday, November 10th, 1886, at his residence at Knox, N. Y., Mr. Daniel C. Seabury, in the 74th year of his life.

Mr. Seabury's death removes from the Reformed Church of Beaverdam one of its most faithful and ardent supporters. He was a man of strong faith and of deep religious convictions, and the secret of his power lay in his private and family devotions. The members of the household, thus built up, were singularly united, and it was but natural to see them, one by one, consecrating themselves to God's service by openly professing Christ. Beyond the members of his household, the life of our friend left a marked influence. His regular attendance on the means of grace, his devotion to the sick and sorrowing, the constant hints which he gave his pastor, in cases of special desire and need, showed that he was a "friend to all only that he might save some." During his long and painful illness he was wonderfully supported by the promises of God. He has entered "the rest which remaineth for the people of God," having left to his family the rich legacy of his faith in Christ. Thus looking upon the closed record of a life well-spent, may we say, "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching." R. D.

STARIN.—Nov. 2d, 1886, at his country residence at Malden, Ulster County, Dr. Lancey Starin, of New York, in the 70th year of his age.

Mr. Starin was born of old Revolutionary stock, at Fultonville, in the beautiful valley of the Mohawk. He grew up and resided many years in his native village, engaged in active enterprise. Over thirty years ago he removed to New York city. Here he employed his remarkable gifts in the commission business, and left behind him a large fortune—witness to that industry, enterprise, thrift and integrity which eminently characterized his career. He was a man of gentle spirit, fond of his home, widely esteemed for his honor and his probity. He leaves a wife, a brother, a sister, and many friends to mourn his loss. He united with Dr. Hutton's church years ago, and lived a life consistent with the high responsibilities of the Christian name. W.

RESULTS in the rapid life of the times are speedily attained. M. Renan has been a notable infidel and has clothed his unbelief in words which have captivated many readers. At last he has thrown away every disguise and appears as a teacher of shameless immorality. Even the Parisian journals are shocked. One says that his last work "tramples under foot all the sovereign laws of virtue," and another describes it as proclaiming "an orgie of sensualism as the last consolation and final joy" of life.

CATHOLICITY—TRUE AND FALSE.—Under this title Dr. G. P. Fisher preached at Chicago, and the Scribners have printed a discourse admirable in temper. But we are not sure that the grounds of true unity are always well taken. We certainly dissent toto coelo from the cool assertion that "To assume that the New Testament contains a fully developed code of Christian morals is a mischievous mistake." On the contrary, it is ten thousand times more mischievous for any man to think for one moment that he can develop better ethics than Jesus or Paul. Out upon the monstrous presumption!

THE BIBLE ITS OWN WITNESS.—In the last issue of the Bible Society Record three instances are cited, two in South America and one in Persia, where recently it has been found that the mere reading of the Word, without any comment by others, and indeed without the knowledge of the existence of Protestants, has led men to the reception of the truth and to the leading of a Christian life. The Bible proved itself to them to be the oracles of God. They accepted the blessed hope it unfolded, and manifested the fact by a consistent walk.

Yet we learn from the Record that the American Bible Society suffers from lack of funds. So far from being "rich and independent," as some have rashly affirmed, its wants are increasing all the time and its means lessening. The large bequests it received some years since are now expended, and there is need for a considerable and steady increase of money to meet the call for the Scriptures that comes up from all parts of the world. There are still a hundred dialects into which the book of inspiration is to be translated, besides the supply of each new generation of the races which already have God's Word in their own tongue. The Bible societies still have an immense work to do, and their claim on every friend of humanity is clear and strong.

THE MORMONS, at least some of them, are not inaccessible to properly directed Christian efforts, as was proved to the satisfaction of all present, when a few weeks ago the dedication, under Congregational auspices, of the New West Chapel in the Fourth Ward of Salt Lake City, drew an audience of three hundred and fifty people, or as many as the chapel could hold, nine-tenths of whom were Mormons or of Mormon affiliations. The Rev. Alexander Monroe, the city missionary, preached a clear and vigorous sermon, outspoken and kind, in which he declared the Scriptural idea of the family and Church, the interpretation the Congregational Church gives to the Bible and the points on which it differs from Mormonism. This discourse was heard attentively and, report says, with "evident sympathy." Three addresses followed, pointing out the object of the work of the Church and the school, and setting forth the desires of the Eastern friends who have contributed for its support, and these addresses it is said were received with "unconcealed joy." But more substantial evidence of friendliness to the Christian effort was given when the collection was taken for furnishing the rooms of the church and school, for to the chapel a school-house is attached to accommodate a Christian day-school. Mr. Holden, of the First Church, which has cherished the enterprise, made a short speech in which he said the people of Salt Lake should bear the whole expense, concluding his manly exhortation with a generous subscription. "Numerous five and one dollar subscriptions followed, not a few of which were from persons bearing Mormon names, some of them names of leading families," and when the receipts were added up, the gifts and pledges were found to exceed the amount needed. Besides, nearly all the Christian schools in the city are calling for more room. They have been full, even crowded, this autumn, and the field is opening before them in a wholly unexpected and surprising degree. It is plain that even the thick armor encasing Mormon hearts and consciences can be penetrated and shattered by the arrows of Divine truth.

ROMANISM does not bear good fruit in Liverpool. At a recent Roman Catholic Mission in that city it was said that during 1885 there were 13,676 Romanists committed to the city prison, whereas of all other religious denominations, "putting them together and calling them Protestants," there were only 7,648 such criminals. It must be taken into the account that the Romanists are but a small proportion of the people of Liverpool. Reviewing the figures, a Liverpool Roman Catholic paper makes the following admission:

The loss to the Church in the large cities and towns of England far exceeds the handful of converts that each year enter the fold. As in Liverpool so in Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, Glasgow, and, more than all, in London, there are thousands of Catholics who never hear Mass from one year's end to another, who for ten, twenty, or thirty years have never approached the Sacraments, and who, if they have not lost the faith entirely, live more like heathens than Christians.

It is said also that Cardinal Manning has recently expressed fears for the future of Romanism in Great Britain.

CERTAIN INCONSISTENCIES.—The Central Labor Union appeals for a cessation of trade on Sunday in order that employees may have a day of rest and recreation; but the Central Union is itself one of the offenders. It meets uniformly on Sunday afternoons. As we understand it, Sunday is the regular day of meeting, and the assemblies on other days are special meetings, called to meet emergencies. Some one, of course, a janitor or some such person, probably two or three persons, must be in attendance to care for the room, to act as messengers or to render such service as the Union may require, and these employees lose just so much of Sabbath rest. The Union should correct its own practice before it attempts to modify that of others.

Another line of almost persistent criticism which comes ungraciously from those who indulge in it, is the condemnation, recently so conspicuous in the daily journals, of the Church for inattention to the vice and degradation and crime of the chief cities. Now these journals, by entering upon the publication and sale of a Sunday morning paper and by the special and varied attractions collected in, often reserved for, that impression, have incalculably increased the difficulties confronting Christian work. Those so engaged in destroying one of the strongholds, if not the chief stronghold, of religion and morality, cannot becomingly assail the Church because its efforts among the godless population of the cities are not more efficient. A man who offers wine and strong drink to one suffering from a raging fever has no right to condemn or to find fault with the physician because the remedies he administers do not restrain or quench the consuming internal fires. No other power in our cities, except perhaps the liquor saloons, is doing as much to promote ungodliness, to produce religious indifference, to keep men away from the church and its influence, as the Sunday newspaper. Nothing ministers with greater effect to materialism, to a disbelief in the spiritual, to the substitution in morals of the code of expediency for the law of God. So using the Sabbath for the purposes of trade and luring men to devote the day to reading a record of purely secular items, the daily morning press is neutralizing what the churches have done in the past and is preventing men from putting themselves at present under religious and moral teaching. The effect of the Sunday paper is becoming more and more manifest in the steady decrease in the attendance of men, especially of young men, upon the Sabbath morning church service. More than ever the congregations of the churches consist of women. The men of all ages will be found at home, reading the Sunday morning newspaper, and not a few of these men but a short time ago were frequent if not regular attendants upon the Sabbath morning service in the church.

In addition to this injurious influence, the papers generally give the widest publicity to and frequently advocate crude religious speculations. How many for months past have repeatedly commended the New Theology of Andover, and with more or less distinctness and force have rebuked and condemned those who hold fast to the form of sound words in faith and love. Those who control these journals, if they know anything about the new speculations, know that they are almost purely conjectural, that they are based upon a belief or tendency which minimizes the holiness of the nature of God and the righteousness of His Government, which leaves scarcely a trace of sacrificial or propitiatory character in the offering of Jesus Christ on the Cross, which favors an exaggeration of the human element in the treatment of the matter of inspiration, and in fact weakens almost every essential, vital point along the whole line of the long accepted belief of the evangelical churches. Not only in this case, but in all of a like nature, the man who cunningly assails the credibility and infallibility of the Scriptures, the doctrine of retribution in the life to come, or any of the points of belief which distinguish Christianity, is more or less approved by a large proportion of the daily journals, and rebuke is administered, often severe castigation, to those who defend the faith once delivered to the saints. A man fit to be trusted with the management of a daily newspaper ought to know that these assaults on the faith of Christians have appeared and disappeared again and again during the history of the Church, and have never promoted true religion or a steadfast and sturdy morality, that in due time their fruit has proved to be grapes of Sodom. But, however this may be, it is certain that those who are constantly engaged in endeavors to reduce the power of the truth which the churches hold and to commend that which the churches disapprove and reject, have no reason to complain of the failure of the churches to win and influence the masses.

A Problem to Be Solved.

BY W. J. R. TAYLOR, D.D.

HAD the Christian Church been true to herself and the Great Commission, there need not have been a separate missionary society in Christendom. The best missionary society in the world is a well-organized and thoroughly consecrated church of the Lord Jesus Christ. In such a church the two great problems are always how to get the men and women and the money for carrying on the work of evangelizing the nations. Sometimes the cry is for the laborers, sometimes for the money, and sometimes for both. Just now the money question is paramount, and the only way to get it is to have it given; and giving it is both a duty and a means of grace. We stay not to argue this point in the face of God's unspeakable gift, and of all that Holy Scripture says about it.

But here are some facts and contrasts for sober thought.

"The average contribution, per communicant, throughout Christendom for the conversion of the heathen is less than fifty cents per annum. In some of the wealthy British churches it is less than twenty-five cents. In America the Congregational churches give about $1.35 per member; the Presbyterians, North and South, average 87 cents; the Presbyterian church in Canada, 55 cents; the Continental churches range from two to six cents per communicant; always excepting the little Moravian Church, which stands out a conspicuous example to the world of what can be done by a willing and consecrated people."...."Think of it! Fifty cents per year, the seventh part of a cent per day, for the conversion of a thousand millions of heathen, from those who profess to have 'tasted of the heavenly gift!'"

Another writer says: "The total sum annually spent on foreign missions is about ten millions of dollars,—an allowance of one cent a year for each soul of this thousand millions."

Now, per contra, the liquor trade in these United States of America takes in $700,000,000 annually; and that of Great Britain is said to reach $900,000,000.

Seven hundred thousand acres of the best land in India are used, under government control, for the growth of the poppy, and the opium made from it brings the British treasury a profit of $40,000,000 per year from its exports to China alone!

For public amusements in the city of New York the people pay $7,000,000 annually; and the value of the kid gloves imported from abroad every year is ten times more than the receipts of all the foreign missionary societies in America. "For liquor and tobacco two hundred and fifty-five times as much is annually spent as for missions."

Facts like these might be multiplied indefinitely. They show the proportion and disproportion of what is given for the intoxicants, luxuries and superfluities of common life; in contrast with the small, reluctant and inadequate provision made by the members and attendants of Christian churches for the grandest objects of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Now for our own Church. The average receipts for the last five years were $74,188, which is an average of a little over ninety-one cents per member of our 83,037 communicants. And this is a notable advance on the contributions of the previous five years. The appropriations for the next fiscal year are about $10,000 beyond those of the present year. The entire amount asked for by the General Synod is $100,000. No one who knows the resources of our churches will say that it is too much to ask, expect and use to advantage.

But how shall it be secured? There is but one way: By the willing offerings of a willing people. But this requires principle at the bottom, method in the process, and consecration of property unto the Lord; with proportionate, regular, systematic and prayerful liberality. There is no plan for this like that of the Apostle Paul: "Upon the first day of the week let everyone of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him that there be no gatherings when I come."—1 Cor. 16: 2. Here in one sentence are all the essentials of the best kind of Christian giving. A regular time—"the first day of the week;" individual responsibility—"everyone of you;" systematic accumulation—"lay by him in store;" proportionate giving—"as God hath prospered him;" and provision against sudden, impulsive, unequal and insufficient and delayed contributions—"that there be no collections when I come." When the churches shall act out these principles and upon this simple and practicable rule, and not until then, will the money problem of Christian missions be solved. Why not? Why not now and henceforth?

THE DIFFERENCE.—It is the custom of Roman Catholic writers in this country to defend the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope by saying that it merely reproduces in the ecclesiastical sphere what we are accustomed to in civil and political relations, viz., a supreme tribunal whose decisions are final. The Pope, therefore, decides a question of faith or morals simply as the Supreme Court of the United States decides a question of constitutional law; and in both cases there is an end of controversy, which is much to be desired. But this statement ignores one important difference. All good citizens are required to submit to a decision of the Supreme Court, but they are in no sense bound to approve it as right. For example, that court recently said that the general government can issue paper money as a matter of inherent sovereignty, but very many agree with the veteran Bancroft in denouncing this judgment as wholly wrong—wrong in the practice it sanctions, and wrong in the reasons given. It is far otherwise with the Pope's decrees. Every good Romanist is bound to submit to these not only as determining law, but also as determining what ought to be law. He must accept the decision, not simply as settling a controversy, but also as announcing the mind and will of the great Head of the Church on the point at issue. There is, therefore, an immense difference between the infallibility of the Pope and the supremacy of the Supreme Court.

FOR A WEEK PAST, contributors to the daily journals have been criticizing and condemning the members of the Christian churches of this city, because they do not secure justice and provide relief for the two hundred thousand women employed in the city at starvation wages. It is said that there is this multitude working itself literally to death, working under sore privations, putting its life into its work, because of the pressure of competition and the greed and heartlessness of employers. The churches are made responsible for the hardships of the lives of these women.

Have other citizens no responsibility for such conditions of the work of women and girls! On what ground is the duty of providing a remedy or obtaining relief taken from the shoulders of those who do not attend the churches and put on the already heavily weighted hands of those who do? With what sort of propriety do men and women outside of the churches coolly transfer to those in the churches the duty of removing the vice and poverty and the folly of the population of this city? These non-church-going people make many and often loud professions of their philanthropy. They talk a great deal about the liberality of their opinions, of their generosity and public spirit. Now let them show the sincerity of their professions by an organized and persistent effort to relieve these workingwomen. It would be very gratifying to see those who denounce the churches take hold of this one matter, so much needing attention, and bring about an improvement.

Furthermore, the Christians of this city are unjustly, probably ignorantly, accused on this as on many other occasions, They have been giving relief to workingwomen for years, and have been and are endeavoring to obtain for them renumerative employment. Those who are so ready to accuse ought first to look into the charitable organizations of the Protestant churches of this city.

One chief cause of the deplorable condition of workingwomen here is the crowding in, from every town and village in the vicinity and from foreign lands, into this city of women seeking something to do. How can this be prevented?

DID HARVARD SHOW DISCOURTESY? AND IF SO, WHY? ....PHILLIPS BROOKS'S ARRAIGNMENT....PROTESTANTISM IN THE EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

THERE was a regrettable episode in the Harvard celebration, especially as the newspapers took it up in their characteristic fashion, not only serving it up in every conceivable style—stewed, scolloped, devilled, and on the half shell—but leaving it in very much the condition of a dead mouse after Grimalkin and her kittens have "played" with it to their hearts' content. It was absurdly reported that Dr. McCosh was offended because he did not receive an LL.D., forgetting that Harvard had conferred it upon him many years ago; also, that he was displeased with Mr. Lowell's oration. Our "venerable" President is neither oblivious of his honors, nor has he lost one jot of his intellectual vigor; and his impression of the oration was altogether favorable, nor is Mr. Lowell capable of being suspected of discourtesy. Dr. Holmes, in his fling at Calvinism, was so unmindful of his stops in making the transition from "Princeton's sands" to Andover's styx-encircled "hill," that many besides Dr. McCosh supposed that the untimely jibe was meant for the latter. But he has since, with evident frankness, disclaimed any such intention; and his explanation has been as frankly accepted.

The omission to recognize Princeton in the distribution of degrees cannot be so easily explained. Here was the third oldest college in the country, and especially invited to be represented on the occasion. And if the President was not available for the purpose, surely some other Princeton man might have been found in College or Seminary quite as worthy as most of those selected for honor. We have certainly no disposition to question the propriety of any of the degrees bestowed, but there are few more eminent men on the list than the astronomer Young, the chemist Brackett, or the historian Johnston, not to speak of Drs. Green, Hodge and Patton of the Theological Seminary. I endeavored to obtain a satisfactory reason from leading Harvard gentlemen, but they did not make the matter any better by explaining that they had not taken colleges into consideration and had sought to recognize the most distinguished men in the various departments of scholarship, irrespective of the institutions which they represented.

I have no idea that there was any studied insult to Princeton intended. Nor that such unpardonable sins of omission as the neglect to even invite a delegation from Rutgers, the fourth oldest of our colleges, were committed with malice prepense. At the same time I do not believe there was any anxiety to go out of their way to honor Calvinism, or evangelical religion. I am willing to condone considerable on the score of ignorance. I doubt very much whether half the Harvard faculty could give an intelligible account of who William Henry Green, or Archibald Alexander Hodge, or Francis L. Patton are, except perhaps that the latter was the man who swung Prof. Swing upon the ecclesiastical gibbet at Chicago for heresy. If there is anything which made Egbert C. Smyth and Alexander G. Allen, respectively of Andover and of the Cambridge Divinity School (both able and excellent men) loom above the Chairman of the American Old Testament revisers, it is only explicable on the ground that Harvard is just now particularly pleased at the recent developments of these gentlemen in "liberal" views.

Yes, there is one other reason, though involving the same provincial narrowness and ignorance. I had the courage to suggest it to more than one of the Harvard men themselves. I had found that, in looking over the honor list, so far as I know them, nearly all the elect were now or originally of New England. This was to be regretted, inasmuch as it was the current impression throughout the country that New England (especially Massachusetts, and still more especially Harvard College) could see nothing outside of itself, and that everybody who hailed from any other part of the land was presumably inferior. This impression was growing, and the United States, which was now a tolerably good-sized nation, was getting restive under the pretensions of a little corner of its territory. It was rapidly rolling its "hub" far west of Boston, and its great and growing seats of learning were preparing to dispute the self-constituted premiership of Harvard or any other college. People were beginning to look over the Harvard Catalogue, and asking what first-class men in any department Harvard had sent out in the last thirty years. They were beginning to perceive that, while she had undoubtedly done more for general literary culture, she had not made any such broad and deep impress upon the life and character of the nation generally as Princeton or Yale, not to speak of some smaller colleges. They were discovering that the whole tendency of the present Harvard education was to promote superficiality and narrowness, if not dilettanteism. They were realizing that this great country had outgrown this famous old college and was taking its measure, as well as its own. It would seem desirable for Harvard's own sake, that this process of disenchantment and disenthralment should come gradually. But it was to be feared that such short-sighted (in more senses than one) procedures would greatly hasten it.

The general tenor of the Harvard celebration, as indicating the present condition of Harvard's self-consciousness, was echoed by one of the orators of Undergraduates' Day. His topic was The Evolution of the Harvard Student. This evolution had been in three directions: first, from the floggings he used to get in Faculty meeting under President Dunster to the absolute irresponsibility of to-day; second, from the cast-iron and limited curriculum wherein the Latin rod swallowed up all the other educational rods of the wise men of Cambridge to the present "go as you please" scamper up the hill of knowledge; and third, from compulsory religion and a Sunday-school cult to the present agnosticism and secularism. The fallacy throughout these boasts and apologies is in drawing the inference, that in leaving one extreme there is no such thing as stopping till the other is reached, and that there is no curing a hide-bound tree except by girdling it and piercing to its heart.

Notwithstanding Phillips Brooks's absurd endeavor to show that every step of Harvard had been an advance in the right direction, there has been no more tremendous arraignment of its inherent and growing skepticism, both in religion and philosophy, than the following brilliant passage from his sermon at the celebration:

"Alas for the college, if these 250 years have meant for it no more than she has been able to see that they were meaning. In many ways it seems as if she had been strangely and specially unable to read the deeper meanings of her history. Our college is not quick to believe the highest things about herself. Our Harvard way is, as a whole, to read life on its negative side more than on its positive. We think of such enlargements as I have depicted rather as escapes from bigotry and superstition than as possible entrances into deeper faith. We dwell more on the exposure of error than on the discovery of truth in spiritual things. We are more afraid of believing something which we ought not to believe than of not believing something which we ought to believe. We distrust the enthusiasms of faith. As we loose our ship from any mooring of the past, to sail out into any great uncertain ocean of the future, we are more ready to listen to the malarial voices which cry to us from the shore 'Begone! Begone!' than to hear the great deep, with its unbounded inspirations, bidding us 'Come on! Come on!' Who of us does not know this temper of our good mother, and how sedulously she instils it in her children?"

Dr. Brooks's pessimistic sermon on his return from the Chicago Convention created quite a panic in Boston among conservative Episcopalians, Dean Gray of the Divinity School at Cambridge, another of the delegates from Massachusetts, felt constrained to render a more Caleb and Joshua report, in an informal address in his chapel during my late visit. He had gathered quite a different impression of the sentiments and prospects of the denomination, and analyzed the vote upon the change of name in support of his opinion. He showed that the apparently strong vote for dropping the words "Protestant Episcopal" was only relatively strong, all the first-class dioceses being against it and all but one or two of the second-class, the vote for it coming from small and peculiarly constituted and manipulated dioceses in the West and South. New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, were solidly opposed. The latter plainly declared that it would not acquiesce.

A distinguished lay delegate from Massachusetts, who probably knows that State as well as any other man, in reply to a question how large a proportion of its Episcopalians would actually be driven away if such action was taken, had said, "At least one-half." The laity as a whole throughout the land are inexorably opposed, The House of Bishops is almost solidly opposed. There would undoubtedly be a dynamitic schism, if it were attempted to carry through any "Anglican" or "Catholic" movement of this kind. A large number of those who voted to drop the "P. E." would not be willing to substitute any such name. It would, in fact, be impossible to agree upon any substitute. Under these circumstances there is no prospect or possibility of the matter being forced, even if the reactionists should have the numerical strength to carry it through a convention. Dean Gray stated, what is not generally known, that the dioceses of the Episcopal Church are virtually independent, and that the General Convention has no constitutional power to enforce its decrees upon unwilling dioceses, much less to compel their continued connection with the Convention if they desire to withdraw.

November 20th, 1886.

An Archbishop on Property in Land and in General.

On Sunday morning, the 21st ult., a pastoral letter by Archbishop Corrigan was read in the Roman churches of his archdiocese. In it he speaks as follows against the Socialists:

Like a sentinel on the ramparts of a city under siege, a highly important duty of a bishop's office is to be quick in discerning dangerous movements and prompt in sounding timely alarm. Therefore we commend you, brethren, to be zealously on your guard against certain unsound principles and theories which assail the rights of property. They are loudly proclaimed in our day, and are espoused by many who would not wilfully advocate what is wrong. It is the fair-seeming of those theories which captivates the minds of many, inasmuch as they abound in promise of large benefit to those who are in sorest need. The distress of the poor is to be relieved, and the burden of the toiler lightened, results which the Church, with a true mother's love, would most gladly see accomplished whenever and wherever just means are used to reach the desired end. But the Church is not the fickle creature of a day, apt to be caught by specious theories, or ready to change her course with capricious unsteadiness.

The Right of Private Property.

Starting from these premises, which no sane man can deny, we invite you to consider in their light the principles about the rights of property against which we deem it our solemn duty to give you some words of warning. First of all, you must understand in its true sense the statement that "all men are born equal." It does not mean that one man may not ever surpass others in power of mind, or strength of body, or beauty of form; since it is a well-established fact that no two men are exactly alike in all respects. All men are, indeed, equal in that they are destined to the same ultimate end, have the same essence, endowed with the same faculties wherewith to attain that end....

Right may be defined as "the moral faculty which each one has for what is his or what is due to him." To prove that a man has a right to any particular object in God's universe, we need only prove that such object is necessary to him in relation to his last end, or even useful, provided the rights of others are respected. Hence, although it is hotly debated now-a-days whether or not man can have the right of property or ownership in land, you must not be led by abuses, however flagrant, or by theories, however specious, to embrace falsehood for truth. Aim, first of all, at having a clear idea of what is meant by the right of property. It is, then, the moral faculty of claiming an object as one's own and of disposing both of the object and its utility according to one's own will without any rightful interference on the part of others. It is universally admitted that man has a right to the use of certain things, but that any man can acquire the right to possess a thing as his own, to the exclusion of others, is sometimes vehemently denied. And among the plausible reasons brought forward in support of this denial is the allegation that all being equal no man has a right to exclude others who have rights as strong as his; not from the free air of heaven, not from the clear light of day, not (they add) from the earth and its farm lands.

Undoubtedly God made the earth for the use of all mankind; but whether the possession thereof was to be in common or by individual ownership was left for reason to determine. Such determination, judging from the facts of history, the sanction of law, from the teaching of the wisest and the action of the best and bravest of mankind, has been, and is, that man can, by lawful acts, become possessed of the right of ownership in property, and not merely in its use. The reason is because a man is strictly entitled to that of which he is the producing cause, to the improvement he brings about in it, and the enjoyment of both. But it is clear that in a farm, for instance, which one has, by patient toil, improved in value, in a block of marble out of which one has chiselled a perfect statue, he cannot fully enjoy the improvement he has caused unless he have also the right to own the object thus improved. He has a strict right—and evil are the laws and systems which ignore it—either to ownership and enjoyment or to a full compensation for the improvement which is his. To strive to base an argument against ownership in land by reasoning on the universal distribution of air and light is only a freak of the imagination.

Human industry cannot scatter a cloud from before the face of the sun, nor lift a fog that may be freighted with damaging vapors; we take the air and the light as God gives them, and we owe Him thanks for His bounty. It was only the earth which fell under the primeval curse when man had sinned, and only the earth, not the air or light, which man's industrious toil can coax back to something like its original fruitfulness. When he has done so, his just reward is to enjoy the results without hindrance from others. Even in such a necessary, abundant and free commodity as water, if a man, by artificial means, congeals a portion of it into ice, is he not entitled to enjoy its exclusive ownership? Can he not demand for it with justice a compensation equivalent to his industry? Once deny the right of ownership and you sow the seed of stagnation in human enterprise. Who would burrow the earth to draw forth its buried treasures, if the very mine he was working were at the mercy of the passers-by whom its riches might attract? Who would watch with eagerness the season when to sow and to reap, and to gather the harvest which is the very fruit of his labors, if he is told that those who stand by the wayside idle are equally entitled to its enjoyment?

True, indeed, in many painful instances the rights of the toiler are trampled on, and the fruits of his labor snatched from his grusp. True, this is done too frequently with concurrence, or at least the connivance of law. This is the evil that needs redress, but such redress can never be brought about by denying a fundamental right or by perpetrating a radical wrong.

The archbishop proceeds to fortify his position by quotations from an encyclical of Pope Leo XIII., which asserts the right of property "sanctioned by natural law" and "the inequality which exists among men, who differ by nature in strength of body and mind, as they do in worldly possessions."

An Arabic Manual.

THE American Publication Society of Hebrew at Chicago have just issued under this title an introductory grammar of the Arabic, with a Chrestomathy, by Dr. J. G. Lansing of the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick. This, we believe, is the first publication of the kind from an American source. There has been a number of works on Hebrew Grammar by scholars of our own land, (J. P. Wilson, Stuart, Bush, Nordheimer, Green, Harper,) and some of them of exceptional value, but the Arabic has been left to British and Continental writers. There is a propriety in the fact that this work comes from a professor in our Church. For the mother Church in Holland for centuries took the lead in this branch of Semitic studies. Erpenius, (died 1624,) at Leyden, issued a Grammatica Arabica which enjoyed an undisturbed supremacy till the time of de Sacy. A hundred years later Albert Schultens, (died 1750,) called the father of modern Hebrew grammar, took up the subject at the same university, and established the thesis that Arabic is an indispensable means for the understanding of the Hebrew. The impulse given by these eminent men is felt to this day. All the great Hebraists of the present century, Gesenius, Ewald, Tholuck, Delitzsch, Smend, and their compeers, are noted for their familiarity with the structure and literature of the sister tongue. It is quite in the line of historical succession that the first student's hand-book for this language should come from the Reformed Dutch body.

Dr. Lansing's volume does not offer to compete with the larger and fuller works of Wright, Palmer and others, nor does it claim originality save in statement and arrangement. But it answers admirably to its title as a manual for beginners. Its merits in this respect are most clearly seen by those who in a former generation had to begin their studies only with such helps as Rosenmüller's Institutiones ad Fundamenta Ling. Arab. The contrast of the clear type, lucid order, precise statement and graduated progress in the manual before us is very great. Dr. Lansing's pages leave little to desire.

Of late there has been a disposition among the learned to claim for Assyriology a preëminent place in adjusting disputed questions as to Hebrew, and the cuneiform is asserted to be a far better help than the Arabic—a view advocated with great warmth by the younger Delitzsch. But without venturing to decide the controversy one may still maintain that the Arabic is indispensable. Its claims may indeed be pushed too far, as they were by Schultens, and as they now are by some scholars, as, for example, when it is insisted that an undisputed idiom of one language may be foisted upon the other when the application rather creates difficulties than removes them; but there is so much resemblance that is undeniable that a constant and reasonable comparison of the two tongues cannot fail to be of real service. And he cannot be a thorough master of Hebrew who is not also well acquainted with the cognate tongues. Heretofore there has been difficulty in obtaining appropriate helps, but the manual of Prof. Lansing puts the requisite material for a beginning within reach of all. The typography is pleasing, and so far as we have been able to observe, correct. It would have been better, we think, to have made the title at the top of the right-hand page not a mere repetition of that on the left-hand page, but a general statement of the particular matter treated, whether verb, noun, etc. The transliteration in the chrestomathy seems a waste of space, bring of no use to one who has not a teacher, and not required for one who has.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

....FAITH MISSION BAND, of the Union Reformed Church, 6th avenue, opposite West 3d street, New York, will hold its ninth anniversary on Friday evening, Dec. 3d, at 7.30 o'clock. Besides reports of the year's proceedings and of the work sustained, solos—vocal and instrumental—duets, choruses, will be rendered by members of the society, and readings, recitations, and dialogues. The pastor, Rev. E. S. Fairchild, will deliver an address. The exercises promise to afford much wholesome enjoyment to those who may be present.

....THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION met at the Synod's Rooms, 34 Vesey street, Monday morning at 10 o'clock, and listened to a very interesting paper on "The Scriptural Relation between Employer and Employed," by the Rev. George Seibert.

Next Monday the Rev. A. H. Demarest will open the discussion with a paper on "Future Probation." All ministers of the Reformed Church are cordially invited to attend.

The following is the list of topics for future discussion, which, as heretofore, will probably undergo a number of changes before the end is reached:

Dec. 6th, Future Probation, Rev. A. H. Demarest; Dec. 13th, Classification of the Parables, T. W. Chambers, D.D.; Dec. 20th, Union of the Evangelical Churches in Canada, D. Waters, D.D; Dec. 27th, The Future of our Church West, Rev. J. W. Warnshuis; Jan. 3d, The Work of the Holy Spirit, Rev. C. Brett; Jan. 10th, The Pastor's Spiritual Power, D. Cole, D.D; Jan. 17th, The Work of the Church in the Prayer-meeting, A. E. Kittredge, D.D.; Jan. 24th, 1 Cor. 16:22, J. H. Suydam, D.D.; Jan. 31st, Miracles, and their Relation to the Laws of Nature, J. H. Oerter, D.D.; Feb. 7th, Holland a Foreign Missionary Field, Rev. D. C. Preyer; Feb. 14th, The Effect of the Progress of Revelation on the Condition and Experiences of Salvation, Rev. W. B. Voorhees; Feb. 21st, The Successful Church of the Future, Rev. J. A. Davis; Feb. 28th, Pauline Sanctification, Rev. P. T. Pockman; March 7th, May the Minister Smoke? Rev. Wm. Vaughan; March 14th, Expediency in Relation to Church Extension, Rev. H. C. Berg; March 21st, How Shall we Reach our Delinquent Members? Rev. John Hart.

....LAFAYETTE PLACE, N. Y.—The Collegiate Consistory before consenting to the lease of the property attached to the Middle Church had received repeated offers each for a larger sum, and yielded finally from the conviction that the income assured could be expended more usefully at another location. The mission work, conducted by the Rev. Livingston Taylor, is so promising that the conviction is that it ought to be continued. Those engaged in it are very hopeful that if transplanted to a site more convenient for those for whom it is intended and among whom it has already obtained much favor, it would soon achieve desirable success. The Collegiate Consistory is considering two or three plans for the transfer of the work to the east side of the Bowery, to a location populous almost beyond belief and not provided with religious services, where it is believed a church can in due time be established. F.

....BETHLEHEM, N. Y.—Trustworthy authority reports that the First Reformed Church has placed a unanimous call in the hands of the Rev. William H. DeHart, pastor of the Reformed Church of Jamaica, L. I. It is believed that Mr. DeHart will soon formally accept this invitation, which has been in his hands for a few weeks.

....SILVER WEDDING AT IRVINGTON, N. J.—The reception in honor of the silver wedding anniversary of Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Vehslage, of the Reformed Church, took place at the parsonage Nov. 12th. Torrents of rain did not prevent a large attendance, and the evening was one of much social enjoyment. A great bag of silver was presented to Dr. Vehslage in an appropriate address by Rev. Mr. Chapman, to which Dr. Vehslage responded happily. Dr. David S. Smith read an original humorous poem, which was received with warm applause. Mrs. Vehslage was presented with a handsome silk quilt. There was a bountiful and elegant supper served, and the evening will remain a charming memory to all who participated. S.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Rev. E. Winter, of Grand Rapids, preached a week ago last Sunday in Chicago for the to be organized English-speaking Reformed Church....The Fifth Reformed Church of Grand Rapids, Mich., which dedicated its new house of worship last Thursday, was organized last January with forty-three families. The church numbers now over one hundred families. This increase has been largely from members of other churches, who have found it more convenient to attend this new church, but a large number have also been received on confession....Rev. H. E. Nies, of Paterson, N. J., has declined the call to Marion, N. Y.

....THE CLASSIS OF SARATOGA met in the North Church, West Troy, Nov. 26th, to dissolve the pastoral relation between the Rev. J. W. Bailey and the church at Northumberland. Mr. Bailey goes to the Congregational Church at West Rutland, Vt.

The following entry was made in view of his dismission:

The Classis, in granting this dismission, does so with deep regret that our pleasant relations must thereby be broken, and with the prayer that in his new field he may find the blessing of the Lord resting on him and his work. S. C.

....NEWARK, N. J.—A Union Thanksgiving-day service of the churches at the north end of Newark and adjacent thereto, was held in the Belleville Avenue Congregational Church. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles H. Jones, pastor of Christ Reformed Church, (Woodside,) being a thoughtful and comprehensive application of Deut. 33:29, for gratitude to the Almighty, in view of the blessings of the past year, accompanied with an appeal for watchfulness on the part of the faithful in guarding the day from the secularizing tendencies which an alien class seek to establish in order to affect an obliteration of the religious element in its observances, as well as from that of all other Christian festivals. * *

....CLASSIS OF NEWARK.—At a session, on Nov. 23d, in the First Reformed Church, the pastoral relation in the East Church was dissolved, and the Rev. Mr. Preyer was dismissed to the Classis of Monmouth. The following minute was adopted: "The Classis of Newark, in dissolving the pastoral relation between the Rev. D. Charles Preyer and the East Reformed Church, hereby expresses its eminent satisfaction with his discharge of the work to which he has devoted himself with exemplary fidelity and consecration; and also its sincere regret at parting from him, together with its sincere wishes for his continued usefulness in the new and important field of service which he is about to enter." The Rev. Peter J. Quick.

MAY I be permitted to give a few personal reminiscences of my first and only pastor?

The Rev. Peter J. Quick and my father made their homes in Clarkstown, N. Y., in the same year, 1837, when I was four years old. Mr. Quick came directly from the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick to the pastorate of the Reformed Church there. My father came from a brief residence in New York city to the neighborhood of his paternal home. These two young men very soon became fast friends, with an intimacy which continued to grow stronger until they both were venerable with heads whitened with the experience of many years. So it came that I grew up not only under the pastoral care, but with the special interest of that man of God. And many a time and always have I been thankful for the good providence which gave me such influences in the days of my youth.

In many respects Mr. Quick was a model pastor. In the good old way he visited the families of his congregation with his elders—having an elder for each of the four districts of his parish—and, after some words on personal religion with each member of the household, prayed in every house. It must be confessed that these, at least to the children, were occasions of dread. Mr. Quick's manner was solemn and formal. His very presence was dignified in a degree far beyond any other within our observation, and his words were to us like a superhuman searching of conscience. But the benefit to us was that they were searchings of conscience which were not easily shaken off when he had gone on his way. All the more reverently we heard his words from the pulpit, which came like a continuation of the solemn message he had brought us in our home and to our individual souls.

More to my taste, and perhaps not less to my profit, was the high discourse which he and my father often held together on less formal occasions. They both were very fond of what they called "the distinguishing doctrines of grace," on the logical and on the experiencial side. My father was one of the old-fashioned catechists who, in a succession of godly men, had gathered each one his own district in that congregation on Sabbath afternoons, from time immemorial, for regular exercises in the Heidelberg Catechism, and prayer and praise. He spent very much study, and time, and thought in preparation for those exercises. Indeed I can say that, though a very busy man in his daily work, he gave himself wholly to that service, for it was never long out of his thought. Most naturally, therefore, when the domine and he got together there was deep conference, which from eager discussion often ran into very tender heart-openings. Then nothing delighted me more than to sit by and follow as well as I could. There was no danger of any embarrassing personal questions now; they would utterly forget my presence, and I had nothing to do but to absorb what my capacity might. So I took my first lessons in theology, not the least valuable of all that I have received, and so I learned more and more of practical piety. Mr. Quick had a clear head, a sound and deep intellect, and, under a manner of old school dignity and formality, a very warm heart.

I should not have written "old school," for it was not a dignity of manner which he had learned—it was altogether natural to him. He was of commanding stature, and straight as an arrow; with a countenance which always reminded me, perhaps from early childish impression, of the portraits of George Washington. His speech in conversation was a little slow, with an unforced but utmost nicety in the choice of words. He had an eagle eye, and a grave face which sometimes lighted with a flitting smile, but which I could hardly conceive moved by laughter.

To me he seemed to be always carrying the burden of souls. I thought of him only as a man who lived for the Gospel of Christ and for the upbuilding of the Lord's people, with a heavy anxiety for those who would not come to the Saviour he proclaimed, that they might have life. I knew him very well in his own family, for by his kindness I went to him for my first lessons in Latin; and in his study, and at his family fireside, and at his table he was what he was before his congregation.

But I wish to speak of him particularly as a preacher, for in this capacity he was singularly little known outside of his first and only charge at Clarkstown. He had a diffidence and reserve which made it torture to him to preach before any people but his own; so that, aside from occasional exchanges with his near ministerial neighbors, he was very rarely heard out of his own pulpit. But there he was a power.

His sermons were prepared with very great care. He lived in his study, and left it, reluctantly, only at the call of duty. There he thought, and studied, and wrote, and prayed. And when he came before his people it was with beaten oil. His manner in the pulpit was very impressive, and his matter always full of the very marrow of the Gospel. He preached Christ, always in such a way that his people could never doubt that to him it was the one only name.

His preaching was pre-eminently instructive. If his people were not rooted and grounded in the Gospel, if they did not apprehend the doctrines of grace, if they did not find help in looking into the mystery of godliness, it was their own fault, not his. And yet his sermons were not the dry bones of theology; they were intensely practical. Manifestly with the strongest desire for the edification of the Lord's people, his ideal seemed to be "that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

And his appeals to the impenitent were often of absolutely overwhelming power. One scene, away back in my childhood, stands out before me yet as if it were yesterday. He had preached a strong appeal to the unconverted, had prayed fervently, with choking voice had pronounced the benediction, and started down the stairs of the high pulpit, when he stopped, and, with a pathos which rooted the congregation where they stood, said, "My dear friends, how can I let you go? How can I give you up?" And then he poured forth a supplementary appeal which went through the hearts of the people like an electric shock—astonishing, holding, convulsing—and there was Bochim, a place of weeping, from the pulpit steps to the outer doors.

He was always impressive; he was often eloquent; and I doubt whether he ever in his life preached a vapid sermon.

I speak of him as I, a child, a youth, a student, a pastor myself, knew him through the thirty years of his pastorate. Since then our lives have lain apart, for he never could be induced to write a letter except under the stress of dire necessity. But I want the Church to know something of him as I knew him, while I say, "My father! my father! the chariots of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!"

J. A. DEBAUN

FONDA, N. Y., November 20th, 1886.

....VETERANS HONORED.—The Classis of Monmouth at a recent session were especially gratified by the presence of two of their venerable and greatly esteemed ministers—the Rev. Garret C. Schenck, D.D., and the Rev. William Reiley, D.D. The following very appropriate action was taken:

Whereas, The last regular meeting of the Classis of Monmouth occurred on the fourteenth day of September, A.D. 1886, which was the eightieth birthday of their dear brother, the Rev. Garret Conover Schenck, a member of this Classis;

Therefore the Classis of Monmouth, assembled in adjourned session on Tuesday, the nineteenth day of October, 1886, do extend to Brother Schenck their fraternal salutations on his reaching an age so seldom vouchsafed to ministers, viz.: that of fourscore years; while they congratulate him upon his being able to attend the meeting of Classis upon that day.

The Classis desire to assure Dr. Schenck of their prayers that the residue of his days may be full of the light of the countenance of our Great Head whose he is and whom he still serves, and that through the gates of life's evening sky the dawn of heaven may grow brighter and brighter to the perfect day.

Whereas, Fifty years have elapsed since our dear brother, the Rev. William Reiley, D.D., was ordained to the Gospel ministry, all but three of which have been passed in the service of the Church of Holmdel and in the bounds of what is now the Classis of Monmouth;

Therefore, we, the said Classis of Monmouth, esteem it a pleasure and a privilege to extend to Dr. Reiley our congratulations on this interesting occasion so rarely occurring in the history of a minister, the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination and the forty-seventh of his pastorate over one people.

We desire to assure Dr. Reiley of our appreciation both of the work which, by Divine grace, he has been permitted to accomplish among his people, and of the value of his judicious counsels in the deliberations of this Classis ever since its organization, and also of his zealous interest in all that concerns the prosperity of each church under our care.

The Classis fervently pray the Great Head of the Church to continue his health and strength so that he, and the people to whom he has so long ministered in the Lord, and this Classis may rejoice together in the enjoyment of a life well rounded into a golden autumn.

....PATERSON, N. J.—Considerable of religious interest is manifest in the Second Church, the Rev. P. H. Milliken, pastor. Meetings have been held almost every night for two weeks, attended not only by an unusual number of church members, but likewise of the unconverted, who seem to take a deep and serious interest in the services. Non-churching parents are being reached through the children of the Sabbath-school, and by them led to the house of God. The attendance at the regular church services has very much increased of late.

The First Church, whose large and commodious edifice came near to being destroyed by fire a few weeks ago, have settled with the insurance companies, and with the allowance received about finished repairing the damage caused by the fire.

The Broadway Church people are happy at the prospect of soon having the organniche in their new church occupied by a handsome pipe organ, to cost $1,650. The young people of the church who, two years ago undertook the work of raising the requisite funds for an organ, have been very successful, and report $1,107 in the treasury and $435 pledged, making a total of $1,542.

The General Outlook.

....The Baptist Weekly is authority for the statement that recently, in Connecticut, three persons were baptized, whose ages were respectively 92, 96 and 106.

....The recent burning of the Baptist church at Bennington Centre, N. Y., is attributed to incendiaries offended by the activity of the church people in late liquor prosecutions.

....A correspondent of the New York Observer says: "The churches of all denominations in South Carolina, since the earthquakes, have had a harvest of new converts. About 1,000 persons have united with the Presbyterian churches during the summer.

....It is proposed to establish in Brooklyn a church for the Chinese, at Raymond and Fulton streets, where there is now a sort of headquarters for work among the emigrants from the Celestial Empire. Over 300 Chinese attend the Sunday-schools of the city.

....The corner-stone of the new building for the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Episcopal Church, at the corner of Chestnut and Forty-third streets, Philadelphia, was laid on October 21st. The group of buildings will consist of a seminary, a chapel and a church, the two latter fronting on Chestnut street and the first on Forty-third street. The cost, including the building lots, will be $250,000. All the money is raised, one lady having given nearly $240,000.

....We take from the Journal and Messenger the following: The Lutherans are making arrangements to introduce into this country an order of deaconesses, similar to that in the old country, and to that in the Catholic Church, except that the consecration is not necessarily for life, but can be renounced at any time. Mr. John D. Lankernan, of Philadelphia, has given $1,000,000 for the institution of a German hospital in that city in which these deaconesses shall be employed, and for the establishment of a school for the education of those accepted and consecrated to this work.

....At the corner-stone laying of a Jewish synagogue at Cleveland, O., the Ohio Masonic Grand Lodge conducted the ceremonies. Besides addresses by two rabbis and a layman, an address was made by the Mayor of Cleveland, and a prayer was offered by a Unitarian minister. Referring to this The Lutheran makes this comment: "Unitarians and Jews are alike in this that they worship one God in one person; neither of them are Christians."

....The Synod of Virginia (Presbyterian Church South) which was organized 99 years ago by nine ministers and four ruling elders, met lately in Richmond, Va., representing 350 churches, 226 ministers and 1,169 elders.

....An English vicar has been sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor for eighteen months for marrying a couple who had not procured a license or had the banns proclaimed.

....At its recent meeting the Synod of Baltimore overtured to the next General Assembly an inquiry whether the reading of the Revised Version of the Holy Scriptures in public worship is consistent with the Presbyterian Directory for Worship which directs the reading of the Scriptures "from the most approved translation."

....The Presbytery of Dallas, in Texas, discussed the subject of the organic union of the Presbyterian churches, North and South, with an earnestness which showed how deep was the underlying feeling. A majority report from a special committee favored the union without naming "insuperable" barriers, going straight to the end sought—reunion. The minority saw the "barrier," denominated them "insuperable," but were hopeful that they might be removed. The subject made so distinct a division among the members of the Presbytery that as a method of easing the contest the whole subject was postponed until the next meeting of the Presbytery.—The Interior.

....The Synods of the Southern Church without exception, and some of them nearly unanimously, sustain the action of the General Assembly in condemning the teachings and course of Dr. Woodrow, of Columbia Seminary. They, also, kindly but positively request his resignation.

....The will of Miss Henrietta Lenox, the sister of the late James Lenox, of New York, was recently admitted to probate. One of the provisions relates to the Lenox Library, founded by Mr. James Lenox. Miss Lenox leaves to the Lenox Library the lot on Madison avenue between 70th and 71st streets, New York, with the proviso that no buildings shall be erected on the lot excepting additions to, or extensions of, the library building west of a line running parallel with Madison avenue and 100 feet therefrom. She also leaves $100,000 to be used for the purchase of books only.

The public bequests are as follows: $50,000 each to the Board of Foreign Missions and the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church; $25,000 to the American Bible Society; $10,000 each to the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women at 73d street, New York, to the Presbyterian Board of Relief for Disabled Ministers and Widows and Orphans of Deceased Ministers, and to the Treasurer of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States for the use of the Committee on Missions for Freedmen; $5,000 to the New York Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and $10,000 to the Rev. Dr. Wm. Paxton, for use among the poor of the First Presbyterian Church.

....Colonel W. Preston Johnston, President of Tulane University, of New Orleans, received a check last month for $100,000 from a lady in New York, for the establishment, in the University, of a school for the higher education of girls and young women.

....A mission Sunday-school, composed of newsboys, bootblacks and street waifs, now assembles on Sunday afternoons in the large hall of the old Board of Trade building, Chicago. The school numbers about three hundred. We cannot yet hold it up as a model in good order, or in knowledge of the Bible lessons, but a good work is being done in the face of rare difficulties, and for those who need friends who will care for them. The school opens with a lunch of sandwiches for the children, and closes with singing by the boys, who are led by Lyon's orchestra, and then the classes march around the hall, the banner boy in each leading his class.—The Interior.

....The annual report of the Universalist General Convention lately held at Akron, Ohio, shows 900 Universalist churches in this country, with 35,214 members and property worth $7,000,000.

....The Congregational church at Hart, Mich., is hard at work building a house of worship. One of the lady members asked a lumber firm at Pentwater for a donation of shingles for the roof, and they promised to give her a wagon-load if she would come after them herself. This she did, taking a big hay-rack, which they filled, and she drove back with little less than a car-load.

....Mr. Sidney L. Gulick, who was ordained, Nov. 17th, is a son of Dr Gulick, of Shanghai, China, and grandson of the honored Dr. Gulick, one of the first missionaries to the Sandwich Islands. He is a recent graduate of Union Seminary, and is laboring most successfully in connection with Willoughby Chapel, a mission of the Clinton Avenue Church, Brooklyn. He passed a most excellent examination.—Advance.

Japan.

WHAT would have been thought of Joshua and the Jews if, when the walls of Jericho had fallen flat before them, they had still faltered and whiffled and finally sent a dozen men against the city? That seems about what we are doing in Japan. The walls of prejudice and exclusion, that had stood for ages insurmountable, have been levelled with the dust. Massachusetts or Illinois is not freer to the Gospel than Japan. A people of wonderful vigor and enterprise is eager for the truth. And Christendom has sent one missionary for every score or two that are demanded.

The now-or-never motto is the motto for Japan. China or Africa, or Turkey even, is, in good measure, a ship aground. There is need of work in each region no doubt. The present generation must be saved. But the nation, as such, may be reached ten years hence. Japan, on the other hand, is a ship already afloat, and with all sails set and a gale to fill them, driving toward the rocks. Buddhism and Shintoism are dying out. The nation feels the throb of the nineteenth century in its veins. It can no more return to the old faith than a young eagle to the egg. The whole population is seething in the ferment of a new intellectual life. Herbert Spencer and Huxley among the upper classes, Ingersoll among the lower, are spreading spiritual desolation like a prairie fire. The native press is flowering out in a perfect spring-time of literature of its own. More than three hundred newspapers, many of them pictorial, are eagerly conned by hundreds of thousands of readers. But they are, in the main, unutterably, almost inconceivably, vile. A chaos of skepticism, a pandemonium of iniquity, is the future into which Japan is rushing unless saved by our Gospel.

And the nation must be saved not for itself alone. Japan stands unconverted at the gate of China. Unawares she is waiting, as we believe, to carry the glad tidings into the Flowery Kingdom with its 400,000,000 souls.—The Advance.

Prayer in Secret.

BY GEORGE W. BUNGAY.

WHERE'ER I bow in secret prayer,
I know a sacred sanction's given,
For God, our loving Father, there
Makes the small cot the court of heaven.

Close to the Saviour's Cross I cling,
With a sweet sense of shadowing wings,
When holding converse with the king
Who reigns above the King of kings.

Prayer is the spirit's earnest speech.
Before the swiftest uttered word
The holy throne above can reach,
The thought of the pure heart is heard.

The Development of the Prayer-Meeting.

BY THE REV. I. W. GOWEN.

A Paper Read to the Pastors' Association.

THERE are two elements in every religious agency, —the divine and the human. These are not radically distinct, but are united, to a greater or less degree, in all truly religious activity. The prayer-meeting is no exception to this principle. A true prayer-meeting is very much like salvation,—the working out in fear and trembling of an inwrought divine power of will and action. With the divine element of the prayer-meeting this paper has nothing to do. It is only necessary to say that, without the presence and recognition of the Spirit of God, the development of the prayer-meeting will be a development of death. The Scriptural foundation of the prayer-meeting is the promise of Christ: "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." This promise insures the divine presence whenever the human condition is fulfilled: The gathering in His name.

Regarding our subject, then, from the human side, we discover the first principle of a true prayer-meeting—"The gathering in Christ's name." The gathering in His name distinguishes the true line of development from the false, as represented in the merely social meeting or the dependence upon superficial elements, as numbers, noise, or novelty. Christ must be the power that draws if we expect any development of life in the meeting; Christ, too, as distinct from the church, the notice, the custom, or our own religious growth.

A slight inquiry concerning the reasons of attendance at prayer-meeting will reveal the various motives which bring together the worshippers; many of them being far astray from the true purpose of the gathering. The discovery and recognition of the true idea of the meeting is the first step in development. With this root power, the next step in the development of the prayer-meeting is the guarding of this idea from hindrances in its manifestation. Life demands scope for its manifestation—the environment must be favorable. This human element is needed, not so much in the development of an ideal prayer-meeting in our minds, but in the development of that flesh and blood prayer-meeting in our churches that often causes us so much careful thought.

There are two common causes of hindrance to the proper development of the prayer-meeting:

I. FORMALITY.—Some prayer-meetings have their life chilled by formality. A good prayer-meeting should have form, but not formality. If there is life it will clothe itself in appropriate forms. Formality, however, is repressive. There are some prayer-meetings in which any expression of spiritual fervor would be considered as not in good form. A spontaneous "Praise the Lord" or appropriate "Amen" would cause most of the audience, including the minister, to have a nervous shock. A meeting of this kind decides everything like enthusiasm as out of order. The order of exercises is followed as rigidly as the reading of the Ten Commandments. No variation appears in the features of the meeting any more than in the face of a mummy. Formal minister, formally opening of the meeting, with formal songs, striving in vain to rise Godward, followed by formal remarks, interspersed (with regular intervals of silence) with formal prayers of formal length, ending with a benediction and a cold and formal departure. The notice that is read from the pulpit every Sabbath announcing the regular prayer-meeting, contains more truth than poetry. Many a prayer-meeting suffers from too much regularity. The presence of Christ does not imply dull uniformity, but charming variety. A cold, formal meeting effectually hinders the manifestation of the Divine presence.

II. SLOTH IN PREPARATION.—The meeting with Christ should be preceded by zeal and thoughtfulness in preparation. Yet how little earnest work is given to the development of the prayer-meeting. A moment's glance at a passage of Scripture, taken often after the announcement of the opening hymn, is all that is required to open a stupid meeting. For, as is usually the case, the slightness of preparation is followed by lengthiness of remark, which is attended by that paradoxical condition of a meeting being closed before it is opened. I am now more and more convinced that the success of a prayer-meeting is due entirely to earnest, devout study and prayer beforehand. The divine side of the meeting is often made a convenient hiding-place for lazy leaders. "God is withholding His blessing," "The Spirit is absent," "We must implore His return." This is only too true; but the remedy is rather in earnest work on the human side than any unwillingness of God to bless. A lazy farmer has a poor crop—for the same reason a lazy minister has a poor prayer-meeting. We get a notion, perhaps from our seminary training, where hardly a thought is given concerning the prayer-meeting, that a prayer-meeting will take care of itself. Such an idea is the cause of so many poor prayer-meetings. The development of this idea of careful and prayerful preparation is a step, and a long one, in the right direction. A pertinent question might be asked of the brethren present, What preparatory work do you give to your prayer-meeting? Is it at all commensurate with the work of sermonizing? It will be helpful to a proper understanding of our subject if this point can be illustrated.

III. LACK OF RESPONSIVENESS TO THE SPIRIT.—"Quench not the Spirit," "Despise not prophesyings." These injunctions need to be written on the walls of the prayer-meeting-room. Many attendants at the meeting refuse to allow the Spirit to use their power of speech. The thoughts suggested to the heart find no utterance, and so are lost to the meeting. There are many reasons for this hindrance, such as natural timidity, want of experience in public speaking, false estimates of prayer-meeting requirements; but none are acceptable to the Spirit. To develop a real, earnest, free meeting needs not only the presence of the Spirit, but a readiness to respond to His slightest behest. It is the province of the leader to enforce this truth: That meeting with Christ implies a responsive heart and its answering tongue. To secure this, frequent opportunity should be given for any to express the thought of the heart, if only in a single sentence or passage of the Word. This should not be left till the end of the meeting or after the regulars have prayed, but at different intervals during the meeting. Never shut the door of utterance by calling upon brethren to pray through the whole meeting. I have known of ministers who practised this method from fear of cranks, or ignorant brethren offending the cultured sense of the rest of the audience. Many a spiritual message has been conveyed through eccentric minds and unlettered lips. It is never a good plan to choke a man off, before you have heard his message.

But, not to dwell longer upon the hindrances to the development of the prayer-meeting, let me turn to the positive side of the subject.

There are different modes of manifestation of the Spirit. We should only seek those modes in our arrangement of meetings. The different forms of service which I have found helpful in prayer-meeting work, I may briefly give:

I. THE PRAISE SERVICE.—Being filled with the Spirit we speak to one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, making melody unto the Lord in our hearts. This service should include personal expression of praise for definite blessings, either spiritual or temporal.

II. THE BIBLE READING.—A good Bible reading requires labor, yet it yields good results. There are two methods—the leader reading the passages himself or distributing them on slips among the audience. There is power in enforcing truth entirely by the aid of the Spirit's choicest instrument—the Word. This is a line of development worked out largely by evangelists and Y. M. C. A. workers.

III. THE EXPOSITORY METHOD.—The true exposition requires accurate and profound study, but as has been said by one in this meeting, "The processes must never be brought into the meeting; only the crystallized result." Expository lectures of the right sort are extremely rare. We have all attended meetings that have been lectured to death. Open Bibles, with lead-pencils in the hands of the listeners, and opportunity to ask questions, renders the expository method more interesting. I have taken the Epistles to the Corinthians in this way.

IV. THE MISSIONARY MEETING.—Since the Monthly Concert on Sunday evening has fallen into disuse, the missionary prayer-meeting has taken its place. It has one advantage over the Sunday meeting, viz., the participation by the laymen. It is well to circumscribe this subject by taking the fields separately and inviting preparation of papers upon missionary fields, and questions of support and management.

V. THE EVANGELISTIC MEETING.—This does not imply that all meetings are not evangelistic; but a special emphasis is laid upon evangelistic work. The Master has said that the harvest is truly plenteous, that reaping is needed ever. I think many can give testimony to God's blessing upon earnest efforts to win souls whenever put forth by His people. I know of a church just across the river that garnered a rich harvest through evangelistic services, entered upon without any special interest previously manifest. I believe every church should engage in a series of evangelistic meetings, either preparatory to every communion, or at least during a few weeks in every year.

VI. A WITNESS-BEARING MEETING.—"Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord." Testimony is lacking in the meetings of our Church. I am always glad when a Methodist gets into my meeting with his testimony; it somehow suggests a reality which is lacking in indefinite remarks. A witness-bearing meeting is no place for general remarks; only personal experience finds a place there. Witness-bearing meetings will need a great deal of developing before they are common in the Reformed Church. These meetings should be held at sufficient intervals to allow experiences to grow. These are but a few lines of work; each brother may suggest as many more.

The last line of development of which I speak is the preparation of printed lists of subjects. I am so situated that I have two prayer-meetings weekly. I am so convinced of the value of giving definite purpose to the prayer-meeting work by a prepared list that I shall use such a list in one of the meetings for the coming year. I am not ready, however, to yield the other meeting to the topical plan. Where there is but one meeting, the adoption of the topical plan, with pliability of use, is no doubt the best in many respects.

If this were other than a Reformed body, I suppose the suggestion that the prayer-meeting might be helped considerably were the sisters in God's family encouraged to contribute something would not be regarded as out of place. But I know even such a suggestion would hardly be entertained as made in earnest. But when, as it sometimes occurs, your faithful masculine allies are absent, and the great majority of those present are of the opposite sex, which is the better course for the minister—to leave the meeting and let it be turned into a ladies' prayer-meeting, or ask the ladies to take part?

Martyrs of Holland.

BY REV. DANIEL VAN PELT.

V. The Widow Wendelmoet Klaasdochter.

IN the service of Christ there is "neither male nor female." The male child alone was formally consecrated; the men were directed to go up to the great feasts at Jerusalem, under the Jewish dispensation; but in the Christian Church membership makes no such distinctions. We are all equally in Christ and He in us; the Holy Spirit gives wisdom and zeal to men and women, and sanctifies activity in both.

From the glorious army of martyrs the women have not been excluded. We read with mingled sentiments of horror and admiration of the frightful tortures so heroically endured by Blandina during the persecution of the churches of Vienne and Lyons in France, under the Emperor Antoninus, in the year 179. With equal courage the women and maidens of Alexandria or Carthage sought the crown of martyrdom, until the bishops were compelled to check the undue eagerness wherewith the painful distinction was courted. We might have expected that the women of Holland would be found among the ranks of the martyrs of the Reformation. That same spirit which made amazons of the women of Haarlem in their defence of the city, would enlist to fight the battles of the Lord Jesus Christ, those who, like Mary and Martha, loved and followed Him among the women of this devoted land.

In the Province of North Holland, on the shores of the Zuyder Zee, lies the small city of Monnikendam. Seen from a great distance across the green and level country, it peeps at you through its walls of living verdure—the lofty trees that stand in double rows where formerly its ramparts frowned. On the side of the sea the town coyly retires from direct contact with it at the base of a shallow bay; but from its dykes or housetops can be seen that Paradise of Oddity, the Island of Marken, lying far out and seemingly afloat upon the Zuyder Zee. Monnikendam was the birthplace of Wendelmoet Klaasdochter, or Wendelmoet, the daughter of Klaas, the first woman of Holland, and perhaps the first woman of Europe who was martyred in the cause of the Reformation.

History makes no mention of her till it describes her as a widow of Monnikendam, and finds her incarcerated in the citadel of Woerden. Remains of that castle or citadel we thought we discovered on our visit to Woerden. Here, too, Pistorius had been confined. On the 15th of November, 1527, she was conveyed a prisoner to the Hague, there to be tried for heresy, and two days later Count Hoogstraten, the Stadtholder of Holland, arrived from Brussels, in order to preside at her examination. Surely these cases of heresy were deemed of exceeding grave importance, since the highest dignitaries in Church and State must needs attend the trials of even the humblest offenders. But no more effective method for giving prominence, and, therefore, widespreading influence to their martyrdom, could possibly have been adopted. The injury which the persecutors thus did to their own cause seemed a veritable judgment of God upon their actions; it was a blindness which was made to fall upon them from His own hand.

On the 18th of November the Stadtholder and the Supreme Court of Holland, in full assembly, caused the Widow Wendelmoet to appear before them. Nothing daunted by the august array wherewith she was confronted, she made answer plainly and firmly to the charges made against her. The questions put to her were met by replies which, for quickness and pointedness, might almost be called sacred repartees.

She was admonished to renounce her heretic opinions, and threatened with the stake if she did not, while some one insinuated that she only despised death because she had never tasted it. "If this power of death has been given you from above," she said, "I am prepared to suffer. True, I have never tasted death; but I shall never taste of it, for Christ has said: 'If a man keep my saying, he shall never taste of death.'"

The specific accusation against Wendelmoet was, that she had spoken sacrilegiously against the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and profanely treated one of the elements. For this she had been cast into prison and placed upon trial for her life. Naturally, therefore, an important part of the examination had reference to the sacrament and her opinions regarding it. The inquiries upon this point she encountered with the prompt and pungent declaration: "I look upon your host as mere bread or dough; but if you consider it to be your God, then I tell you that it is your devil!"

It was announced to her accordingly, after a few less important questions, that since she remained steadfast in her blasphemous unbelief as touching the host, sentence of death must be pronounced upon her. She was, therefore, urged to prepare herself for this extremity by full confession to the priest, in order to obtain absolution. She was again ready with a telling Scriptural answer: "Even now," she said, "I am no more alive, for I am crucified with Christ, yet Christ liveth within me by His Spirit. And I have made confession to Christ the Lord, who has taken away all my sins." Nevertheless she begged that, if she had offended any one, she might be forgiven of such.

The quick-witted and undaunted woman was now remanded to prison and placed in the stocks. Here she was exposed to annoyances and questionings by the populace. Among others, a simple-minded woman addressed her, lamenting her fate, and saying: "Why not think what you please, but keep still about it; then you wouldn't need to die like this?" The heroic Christian gently answered: "Dear sister, I am commanded and called to speak forth what I believe; therefore I am not permitted to keep silence."

The next day but one was Sunday; a platform, as usual, was erected upon the Binnenhof, and before the judges, thereupon seated with imposing dignity, the humble widow was bidden to stand and receive her sentence. After a last futile attempt to obtain a promise to recant, the sentence was read. It was to the effect that since she had been proven in error regarding her belief in the Sacrament, and persisted in her blasphemous language against the Host, she was found guilty of heresy.

And now took place that farce so oft-repeated since, and which always formed a part of the auto-da-fe in Spain. The spiritual judge handed her over formally to the civil judge, to do with her what seemed unto him lawful, and commending her to his clemency. This ecclesiastic then withdrew from the council, for by the law he could not, as a clerical member, take part in the deliberations involving a capital sentence. The result of these mock deliberations might readily be foreseen. Having been proven guilty of heresy, she was declared guilty of death. The Chancellor of the Province, therefore, read the civil sentence, that she should be burned to ashes, and her goods confiscated.

Wendelmoet was now led away to execution. A wretched monk troubled her exceedingly on the way, by continually pressing a crucifix upon her, that she might touch it with her lips; but she indignantly pushed the idolatrous symbol away from her. Arrived at the stake, a holy peace soothed her heart and made her countenance beam with a cheerful hope and undoubted assurance of salvation.

The sentence of the stake, in those earlier days, usually included the merciful provision that death by strangling should precede the burning of the body. This part of the sentence being now about to be executed upon her, she closed her eyes as if disposing herself for sleep, and her heroic soul was released from the body of clay. As soon as it was ascertained that she was dead the wood was kindled, and her form was reduced to ashes.*

Thus the 20th of November, 1527, was made memorable. A "mother in Israel," an "elect lady," had maintained her faith before the great ones of the land, and refused to deny her Lord even when confronted with the fear of violent death. She had added a woman's name to the list of those martyrs whose blood was to fertilize this soil for the vigorous growth of the Reformed Church of Holland.

Filling Our Place.

BY REV. ELBERT S. PORTER, JR.

TO one who thinks about it, nothing is more apparent and at the same time astonishing than that everything in nature has an appointed and proper place to fill. There it fits in like a stone in a Mosaic picture, and is in harmony with all else. Outside of that place it is merely waste and useless. A fish in the water cannot exchange elements with a quadruped on land. Each one is adapted to its own peculiar position in the order of nature. A polar bear is very much out of place in the tropics, and is a forlorn and dubious specimen of animal life even when, in a great city of the temperate zone, he is supplied with unlimited quantities of water in which to lave his thirsty body. The ice-floes and Arctic seas furnish his proper sphere. Every latitude and country has animals and plants peculiar to itself. There they flourish and bear fruit. Outside of their own circle, in another quarter of the globe, they may, indeed, live and go through all transitions, from seed-vessel to fruitage, but there is not the same abounding life as where all the conditions were adapted to growth.

We find beautiful ferns in our woods, spreading their feathery tracery over the ground, but we are taught that there was a time when the surface was better adapted to plant life than at present, and that what now may reach a few inches, or at most three or four feet, then attained gigantic size, sending fronded branches high up into the air, heavy with nourishing gasses. Those ancient ferns had a place in nature's laboratory. Their duty it was to extract carbonic acid gas, favorable to their growth, and from the atmosphere thus prepare the air for the lungs of warm-blooded animals. Nor was that all. The stems of those ancient growths, imbedded deep in the earth, furnish fuel to man, and when the glowing coal sends out its heat and radiance in our homes, we have in a form mineralized by ages of submergence, merely the relics of plants which thousands of years ago flourished where the hand of the Creator had placed them.

There is little uncertainty in determining the place of man, as highest of created things and as only a little lower than the angels, but there is more difficulty in assigning to each one his proper place in society. There is for every one a sphere of activity where he or she does what tells best and most; where the life of the individual is most efficient in work or in aiding and stimulating others to effort. All are members of one body and all owe duties to each, as well as each to all. I believe it to be a fact which will pass unchallenged in the statement, that every man and woman has a peculiar niche to occupy in the world's history. Whether that niche be filled well or ill depends in large measure upon the make-up of character. It is a great thing accomplished when we discover pretty nearly what we are good for; what thing there is which we can do; what occupation or employment is best adapted to our strength, both of mind and body. Necessary is it to success in life that the right vocation be adopted.

Some people try to fill places too large for them. The result is rattle, friction and clogging of wheels. Sometimes the reverse is true, and there are men and women called upon to exert talents fit for an empire, within the four walls of a room. But the danger does not lie in that direction. "I do not," says Emerson, "pity a man below his place, but I do pity a man above his place." When the large place seeks the man then he may reasonably expect to fill it; but when the case is reversed, he would do well to pause before stepping into a position attractive, indeed, from afar, but likely to demand more knowledge, skill and honesty of purpose than he may possess. There are more lawyers, doctors and ministers than there are farmers, blacksmiths and carpenters out of place. The reasons may be complex, but the result is plain.

"How may I find a place?" That is a question constantly asked. No specific answer can be given, but this general reply may be made: "Your work lies at your hand. Success is no more certain in Chicago than in New York." Is opportunity wanting? It may be, for that which you desire, but not for what you can do. Many a person sighs for a college education and neglects to read books at hand, which in a few years might give more information and training than the longest series of lectures. You will not take the train by sitting in your parlor, but by packing your bag and going to the station. The natural method of living is the best. It is not natural for fish to breathe clear air, nor for most people to inspire the atmosphere of Wall street. A certain gentleman, addressing Yale students on the subject of sleep, said: "Napoleon could get along with only a little sleep, but it is not likely that many of you are Napoleons."

The majority of the human race have to live at home. By this I mean that they have duties to perform, valuable in a certain place, but which will never be known outside the limits of their town or, mayhap, fireside. There are millions upon millions of Hindoos living in village communities and in quiet among themselves. There they pass their lives in the routine of domestic and agricultural life, and know nothing of the outside world. But such a case with us is impossible. Eight thousand newspapers in the United States carry information of events to every cottage in the land. But, because I may happen to see that silver has been discovered in Colorado, gold in California, manganese in Pennsylvania, and tin in Idaho, that is no particular reason why I should drop my employment and start for the Alleghanies or the Rocky Mountains. Ten to one I would wish myself back before many weeks were past. When we are distinctly called, then it is time enough to answer. As a matter of fact, most of us are called to places which seem to us so small that we do not recognize them. We think there is nothing to do and so do nothing. But the moment we begin to do, even the smallest thing, with the determination to do it well, how the work widens and broadens!

It is as we do all we can that we fill our places thoroughly. Just when we fall short of faithful performance then there is failure. Where there is all done possible with the materials at command, there the place is filled.

The absorbing desire for a great position is fatal to usefulness in any. A boy who learns each lesson as it comes, and does not waste time wishing to be President, is on the high road to success. Do that which lies over against you, and it may lead you farther than you think. Saul went after his father's asses and found a kingdom. Hugh Miller was a good quarryman, and what he saw in the stones has made his name known round the world. Martin Luther wrote his theses at little Wittemberg, but the echoes which they awoke have not yet ceased sounding. The same qualities which made Cincinnatus a good plowman and a worthy citizen, made him also twice dictator of the Roman armies.

Geographical place is really little to the point. That has next to nothing to do with the extent of our sphere. Texas contains territory more than ten times the extent of Greece; the former yields cattle, the latter produced Solon, Pericles, Æschylus, Socrates, Plato, and a throng of statesmen. If you should employ England as a standard of measure, you would need to put her down ten times on the surface of Alaska, and then to use the whole of Scotland, Wales and Ireland to fill up the edges. Dakota is twenty-five times the area of Palestine. It is not their size that makes places great, but what men do in them. Not geographical extent, but force of mind and soul. The question for the miller is not "How large can I make my buhrstones?" but "How much power is there in the stream?" It all comes down to this mere question of ability to do. If we cannot fill completely a little place, we need not be in a hurry to find a larger sphere of usefulness. There is a vast difference between feeling too large for our place and being so. As a rule, those who think least of themselves are the ablest. Cato, it is said, preferred to be, rather than to seem good.

The Reading Room.

Books for the Holidays.

....“SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER.” Illustrated by Abbey. Decorations by Alfred Parsons. Introduction by Austin Dobson. Folio, Illuminated Leather, Gilt Edges. Of the merits of the letter-press of this magnificent volume it is not needful to speak. A stock play which has kept its place on the boards for more than a century may well be considered a classic. The present edition of it is as fine a specimen of book-making as ever came even from the prolific press of the Harpers. Thick, heavy paper, a clear imprint and large margins leave nothing to desire. The illustrations have for the most part appeared in successive issues of Harper's Magazine, but here they are seen to much better advantage. The artists seem to have seized the spirit of the text and expressed it with great force and beauty. The volume as a whole is worthy of all praise. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“NATURE'S HALLELUJAH,” by Irene E. Jerome, is a series of drawings after the manner of those of “One Year's Sketch Book,” which has so tenaciously retained its hold upon the admiration of the lovers of nature. When the Sketch Book appeared not a few critics regarded it as the most beautiful book of the kind they had ever seen, and doubted whether it would be excelled. Whether “Nature's Hallelujah” is an advance upon the artist's previous work is doubtful; but it certainly is a no less lovely volume. The book contains nearly fifty drawings from nature, embellished with flowers and birds, and accompanied by poetical selections, words of Scripture, and original sentiments, illustrating the life of the woods and fields in April, May and June. Miss Jerome is not conventional, copies nature, idealizes but a little, and her pictures are, therefore, fresh and true, and have the air of originality. She is evidently quick to perceive the beautiful and to apprehend the secret of its charms, and this her pencil faithfully records. The result is a series of pictures which grow upon the admiration of their possessors and become as dear as the familiar rural scenes which captivated the senses in the life of youth, unspoiled by fashion or the artificial judgment which often passes for a cultivated taste. On these ample pages these drawings and designs appear as they deserve. The volume is elegantly bound in gold cloth. It is one of the most captivating books prepared for the approaching holidays. (Lee & Shepard.)

....“CHARACTER SKETCHES FROM THACKERAY.” From original drawings by Frederick Barnard. We have here in a portfolio six fine photogravures of Becky Sharp, Major Dobbin, Major Pendennis, Colonel Newcome, The Little Sister, and the famous Costigan. The figures are full length and give the impression of the best steel engraving. Mr. Barnard's conceptions of these noted creations of genius differ from the illustrations which are so well known from Thackeray's own pencil. Yet we think the artist did better than the writer. Thackeray was more of a caricaturist than anything else when he drew a figure, and Mr. Barnard has taken as his models the men and women one meets in the streets of London. The grave army officer, the old dandy standing in the club window, the hospital nurse, the “seedy” Irish gentleman, look upon us in the “Character Sketches” and impress us as if selected from a number of photographs. Becky Sharp is simply a lovely actress, and we think Mr. Barnard has failed somewhat in imparting any idea of a keen selfishness to her face. Yet, after all, who knew Becky Sharp except they watched her life?

The pictures are on the heaviest paper and would almost bear framing. The collection is certainly one to be prized by all art lovers. (Cassell & Co.)

....In “THREE KINGS: A Christmas Legend of Long Ago,” Mary Leland McLanathan has versified a pious legend of the days of good King Arthur, to which Rosina Emmet has added four illustrations in a modified mediæval style. The versification is melodious, lucid, engaging, and sustained throughout; is in fact of rare merit. The drawings are in harmony with the theme. The divisions of the legend begin with a rubricated initial letter. The carol of the “Three Kings” is printed at the end of the volume with the music. Various designs and mottoes, appropriately introduced, increase the pleasant impression of the book. The text is printed on one side of the leaf of thick paper agreeably tinted. The cover of boards is adorned in modernized mediæval style with the title, the words and music of the chorus of the “Three Kings,” with the Christian monogram, and the words of the song of the angels at Bethlehem. The book is very handsome and valuable. (Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.)

....A delightful conceit, wrought out with rare felicity, and a most appropriate gift for the day which recalls the birth of the Holy Child, is “HOME FAIRIES AND HEART FLOWERS,” consisting of “Twenty Studies of Children's Heads,” accompanied by floral and other becoming decorations, by Frank French, to which are added the varied attractions of verses by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster. The children's heads, the preface suggests, have been somewhat idealized, but they are true flesh and blood faces and figures, charming in beauty, vivacity and the unconsciousness of innocence. The artist has practised a wise economy in the floral and other framing of these selected portraits. The eye is not lured away from the main theme, but is assisted in apprehending the characteristic the picture is intended to illustrate. The work of Mr. French will gratify the most exacting taste and captivate the hearts of thousands. Mrs. Sangster's duty was perhaps the more arduous, and yet could not fail to be inspiring. Her verses are tender, musical, full of love and cheer, and the echo of their rhythm lingers in the memory. The covers of the volume are decorated in admirable taste and the printing of the text and engravings is perfect. The men of the press room have seconded the artist with a judgment and skill and carefulness worthy of high praise. (Harper & Brothers.)

...A company of mighty men among the artists have undertaken a pictorial exposition of Sir Walter Scott's lines on “CHRISTMAS IN THE OLDEN TIME,” and achieved a memorable success. The wintry landscape, the glowing hearth, the bell ringers, the choir of monks, the gatherers of the mistletoe, the bringing in of the yule log, the feast in the hall, the merry makers, the damsel who “donned her kirtle sheen,” the serving men and women, the baiting of the boar, the masquerade, the joys of the cottagers, and the full round of Christmas festivities are pictured by Garrett and Fenn, Davis and Teel, Sandham, Hassam and Barnes, and they who look upon the gallery they have prepared will not forget it. On one page are from two to a half dozen of the poet's lines, on the opposite page is the artist's delineation of their theme, and both are printed with the highest precision and elegantly. The volume, bound in gilded and decorated cloth, is a beautiful Christmas book. (Cassell & Co.)

...“THE LAND AND THE BOOK; or, Biblical Illustrations Drawn from the Manners and Customs, the Scenes and Scenery of the Holy Land.” By William M. Thomson, D.D. A comparison of these three elegant octavo volumes with the two duodecimos published by the author nearly thirty years ago, under the same general title, shows the great progress made in the knowledge of the Holy Land and the extent of Dr. Thomson's own studies and uses of the results of later explorations continued to the present time. The first volume relates to Southern Palestine and Jerusalem; the second includes Central Palestine and Phœnicia; and the third is devoted to the regions of Lebanon, Damascus and Beyond Jordan. Maps, indexes, one hundred and forty-seven beautiful illustrations, many of them full-page, and all newly prepared, mostly from photographs taken on the spot for this work, with copious tables of contents of each chapter, and complete Biblical references, add greatly to the value of each volume. The veteran missionary scholar has lost none of his earlier enthusiasm with his forty-five years of service and of personal residence and travel amid the scenes which he so graphically describes. “The Land and the Book” illustrate each other as no other lands and books do so completely, and this new edition of Dr. Thomson's work will furnish material assistance to Bible reading, study and teaching for all who are fortunate enough to own it. It will make a capital holiday present for ministers and Sunday-school teachers, and a noble addition to any library. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“OUR ARCTIC PROVINCE.” By Henry W. Elliott. Much reasonable and a great deal of unreasonable and needless discussion has been had, from the time of its purchase, as to the real value of Alaska—the latest addition to our national domain. It was even the fashion at one time to heap ridicule upon Mr. Seward, who negotiated for the transfer and secured it. Mr. Elliott takes neither side in the controversy. His simple aim is so to present the results of his own observations as to enable the reader to form his own judgment,—“to portray in word, and by brush and pencil, the life and country of Alaska as it is, so clearly and so truthfully, that the reader may draw his or her own inference, just as though he or she stood upon the ground itself.”

We are bound to say that he has very fairly succeeded. A more complete description, divested of personal bias or prejudice, it would be hard to find. The description “by word” is made more vivid and intelligible by numerous illustrations, all expressive, many of them admirable. The people and their character, customs and modes of living; the country in its vast extent and all its features of forest, river, glacier, mountain,—the largest rivers and the highest mountains in North America;—the resources of mineral wealth, the fishery, actual and possible, and the habits of the seal, methods of capture, preparation of the skins and particulars of the trade, are all given with such minuteness of detail and colorless impartiality as to leave little further to be desired. In fact, minuteness is sometimes carried to the length of weariness or bewilderment, and, not infrequently, conciseness would have served the author's purpose better. If we notice, in addition, occasional faults of style, inaccuracies or inelegancies of expression, we have exhausted the faults of the book, so far as we have discovered them. Its merits are many and manifest, and the work is exceedingly valuable and interesting, and is handsomely gotten up. (Scribners.)

....It needs hardly to be said to the boys and girls of this country that when the year's numbers of so popular a weekly as “HARPER'S YOUNG PEOPLE” are bound together in the usual elegant ornamental cloth covers, they make a very attractive and fascinating volume of over 800 pages, crowded with pictures such as the children never tire of looking at and reading about. It is a delight to the little folks of the family the whole year through, and only ceases to be a daily joy when supplanted by the succeeding new volume. The one just issued possesses merit equal to, if it does not surpass in the beauty and cuteness of its illustrations, and its entertaining stories and pretty bits of poetry, its predecessors. Make your children a present of a copy.

....“IDYLS OF THE MONTHS.” Poems and Drawings by Mary A. Lathbury. This is a dainty ribbon-tied book, in which each month is represented by a full-length female figure, with verses and emblems printed by her side. Each is printed in color, and some of the pictures are certainly very attractive. A clever reference to the proper gem for the month is also introduced into the poems, so that fair ladies may learn just what to wear. For many, doubtless, this would be a calendar prized for its beauty no less than as a proof of affection. (Geo. Routledge & Sons.)

....“THE CHILDREN OF THE WEEK” are a series of remarkable stories, one for each day of the seven, “Related by the Red Indian to Alexander Selkirk, Jr.,” and “truthfully set down by William Theodore Peters, with pictures thereunto,” and very entertaining and agreeable pictures they are, “by Clinton Peters.” The Red Indian—we are bound not to tell who he was—told, as we have already said, a remarkable lot of stories. If he made them up, as we strongly suspect, he had a wonderful amount of knowledge for an Indian. In every story, among other strange but exceedingly interesting affairs, in which dolls and children and men and women, and of course fairies and kings and queens and princes and courtiers, are engaged, he drops from his lips words which show that he has read a great many books, and those not such books as one would imagine could find their way to wigwams in the woods or on the prairies. There is much to be learned, therefore, from this red man, and we have found him also a very agreeable companion. The truth is, we sat up one night listening to him to a much later hour than we ought to have done. The singular occurrences the Red Indian relates are accurately presented in pictures by Clinton Peters, who must have seen a very great deal, indeed much more than most of us ever have. All this, the stories and pictures, is in a book with a beautiful, gay cover in blue and white and gold, and we seriously advise the little people to insist that they have this book for Christmas. It can be bought of Messrs. Dodd, Mead & Company, of this city.

....“THE TALE OF TROY.” Done into English by Aubrey Stewart, M. A. To popularize the Iliad, we now have the story of Homer told in prose, so that a child can read it. The incidents are carefully given and the simplicity of the blind bard forces itself anew upon the attention as the narrative goes on. At the same time we should think the most intense desire for “blugginess” would be surfeited, even in one of “Helen's Babies,” by the number of conflicts in the Iliad, and the childish mind would be tired by the lists of names. Older readers will, however, find the story useful in fixing the various scenes firmly in memory. (Macmillan & Co.)

....“CHRISTMAS SELECTIONS.” Arranged by E. S. Lorenz, A.M. This pamphlet contains forty-eight pages of the most charming and attractive Christmas Recitations, Readings, Dialogues, and other exercises for Christmas that can be found anywhere. (United Brethren Publication House, Dayton, O.)

....“THE ALHAMBRA AND THE KREMLIN.” By S. Irenæus Prime, D.D. “ROYAL GRACE AND LOYAL GIFTS.” By Frances R. Havergal. These are new editions of excellent books issued by A. D. F. Randolph & Co. The former gives Dr. Prime's life-like sketches of persons and things in the South and the North of Europe. The latter blends in one volume several of Miss Havergal's separate issues, and prefixes, under the appropriate title of “A Consecrated Life,” a touching outline of the life and character of this gifted and gracious woman.

....“MANNERS MAKYTH MAN.” By the author of “How to be Happy though Married.” The first book of this writer excited attention by its quaint title, and proved to be interesting and sensible. The same result will follow in regard to this second issue. The book is full of wise suggestion given in a lively form, and we are sure that persons of any age would find it entertaining and profitable. Such books can hardly be too strongly commended. (C. Scribner's Sons.)

The Carlyle Correspondence.
EARLY LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE.
EDITED BY CHARLES ELIOT NORTON.

With Two Portraits. 12mo. $2.25. This Day.

"There are three points of interest in the early letters of Thomas Carlyle, which Mr. Charles Eliot Norton has carefully and industriously edited. One is the way in which this young man, after his graduation at Edinburgh, set about the work of life. The second is the gradual turning to a literary career, after he had given up the idea of preaching, and was disgusted with teaching, which is here portrayed. The third is the way in which a Scottish philosopher and man of genius courted the Scotch maiden, who, in 1826 became his wife, which is here set forth in its true colors. This point has been obscured by Mr. Froude, and here receives fair statement."—Boston Herald.

New and Popular Edition.

HISTORY OF NAPOLEON I.
BY
P. LANFREY.

Translated with the sanction of the Author. New and Cheaper Edition. 4 volumes. 12mo, $9.

"So excellent a work deserves to be studied by every one who cares about modern European history."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Lanfrey's conception of the great soldier is, we think, the only true one ever evolved by the historian....He admits his marvelous military genius, which grew enfeebled with age, and was nurtured from the fickle breast of fortune. But of the intellectual man the author's pen is not less keen; his insight seems unerring, and not a thought seems to have crawled from the Napoleonic brain whose origin and history are not familiar to his apprehensive mind. We esteem the author's estimate of Napoleon Bonaparte the soundest and surest and most faithful that has ever been made."—Literary World.

NEW ILLUSTRATED BOOKS.

DAYS WITH SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY.
From the Spectator. With numerous illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Small 4to, cloth, gilt, $2.00.

"The airy humor, daintiness, and refinement of Mr. Thomson's sketches are almost beyond praise; they fit the quaint, delightful old text as the glove the hand. With the technical beauty of the best French illustration, Mr. Thomson combines a refined and dry humor which we do not often see in a Frenchman's work. Where the Frenchman would use the grotesque, the Englishman seems to dip his pencil in sunny wit. It would be hardly too much to call Mr. Thomson the Charles Lamb of illustration."—New York Tribune.

OLD CHRISTMAS AND BRACEBRIDGE HALL.
By WASHINGTON IRVING. Profusely illustrated by RANDOLPH CALDECOTT. An Edition de Luxe, on toned paper, in one volume, Roy. 8vo, cloth, gilt, $5.00.

"As simple and unaffected here as the writer whom he is illustrating, and, where the text calls for it, he is as quaintly characteristic and elegant. There is a high-bred air about many of his faces and figures—an inherent grace and loveliness—which is delicious. These qualities are conspicuous in his ladies and his children. His little bits of landscape, glimpses of houses, country roads, and so on, are wonderfully effective. A fine sense of the quiet humor of Irving runs through all, and one feels in reading him that he has found, for the first time, an adequate and sympathetic interpreter. Caldecott and Irving will henceforth be associated together in our minds whenever we think of 'Bracebridge Hall' and the 'Sketch Book.'"—Mail and Express.

New Books for the Young.

By the Author of "Carrots," "Us," etc., etc.

FOUR WINDS FARM.
By MRS. MOLESWORTH, Author of "Carrots," "Cuckoo Clock," etc. With illustrations by WALTER CRANE. 16mo, cloth, gilt, $1.25.

Mr. A. C. Swinburne, in the Nineteenth Century, writes: "Since the death of George Eliot there is none left whose touch is so exquisite and masterly, whose love is so thoroughly according to knowledge, whose bright and sweet invention is so fruitful, so truthful, or so delightful as Mrs. Molesworth's. Any chapter of the 'Cuckoo Clock,' or the enchanting 'Adventures of Herr Baby,' is worth a shoal of the very best novels dealing with the characters and fortunes of mere adults."

MADAM TABBY'S ESTABLISHMENT.
By KARI. Charmingly illustrated by L. WAIN. 16mo, cloth, gilt, $1.25.

THE NECKLACE OF PRINCESS FIORIMONDE
And Other Stories. By MARY DE MORGAN, author of "On a Pincushion." With Illustrations by WALTER CRANE. Square 16mo, extra gilt, $1.25.

"Seldom has a more charming series of fairy stories appeared than this little collection....The refined and glancing wit, the alluring grace of style, and the intrinsic interest of the tales, will mark this as one of the popular Christmas gift-books."—Boston Traveler.

"As simple and as charming as the old-fashioned fairy tales, and each has a moral as apt as any of Æsop's."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

"A charming series of fairy stories, beautifully illustrated. Nothing could be nicer for the young people." -Pittsburgh Chronicle.

The Principles of Hygiene,
Including the essentials of Anatomy and Physiology.

By Ezra M. Hunt, A.M., M D., Sc.D.,
Tenth President of the American Public Health Association; Secretary of the State Board of Health, New Jersey; Instructor in Hygiene in the State Normal School of New Jersey.

12mo, cloth, illustrated, 400 pages.

This is an authoritative work on an original plan, which makes the knowledge of hygiene and the practice of its principles the first aim, using the study of anatomy and physiology as a means to this end and not the end itself.

The effects of alcoholic stimulants and narcotics are treated in proper connections, and the author has not failed to state the entire truth on these subjects, and has been particular to give no doubtful views.

A CHRISTMAS NOVELTY.
Seekers After the Light.
From "Ben Hur."

This souvenir is issued with the kind permission of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, publishers of "Ben Hur," and General Lew Wallace, its author. It consists of four colored etchings, illustrating the meeting of the three wise men as Seekers after the Light, and the appearance of the Star announcing the Birthplace of the Redeemer. The etchings are accompanied by text explanations selected from "Ben Hur." Embossed silver stamping on a heavy tinted cardboard, bound with a wide satin ribbon to match, forms the very unique cover. The unprecedented and continued sale of "Ben Hur" needs no comment, and we therefore feel confident that the many thousand readers of that interesting book will be gratified also to possess this little token, so APPROPRIATE FOR A CHRISTMAS GIFT. AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

When the Winter Days Draw Nigh.

WHEN the leaves our pathway strew,
And the birds forsake the trees,
When the frost supplants the dew,
And chill-laden comes the breeze;
When the grass has turned to brown,
And we've seen the flowers die,
Then, we sadly have to own,
That the winter days draw nigh.

When the sun delays to rise,
When it sets ere day seems done,
When we gaze at brilliant skies,
Both at rise and set of sun;
When the farmer's crops are stored,
And the fields are green with rye,
When upon the festal board
Welcome we the pumpkin pie;

When the chestnuts burst the burr,
And the trees are whipped with care,
When the children gather them,
And the squirrels get their share,
Housing them for winter's food,
Doing it upon the sly,—
When these things have taken place,
Then, the winter days draw nigh.

When the Indian Summer haze
Whispers to a warmer sky:
Hinting of the woods ablaze
And of leaves that smould'ring lie,
It but cheats a little while;
Nothing loth to say good-by,
Autumn, with a parting smile,
Bids the winter days draw nigh.

When we gather round the hearth
As the evening hours slip by;
Never dearer seems our home
Than when winter days draw nigh
When the poor deplore their need
May the rich, from full supply,
Deal to them with bounteous hand,
While the winter days draw nigh.

When the giver will rejoice
That the poor no longer grieve,
Greater blessing comes to him
Than to those who do receive.
All may to the future look
With a hopeful, trustful eye;
Nothing comes by chance to us,
Though the winter days draw nigh. NELLA NAY.

A Happy Anniversary.

WE have great pleasure in publishing the following letter, which may stimulate other societies to renewed effort:

DEAR AUNT MARJORIE: Last Friday evening, Nov. 12th, proved a very delightful occasion to the members of our Ladies' Missionary Auxiliary of the Reformed (Dutch) Church at Nassau.

Feeling somewhat discouraged over the work of the past year, we determined to submit to an innovation, lay aside all diffidence and conduct our fifth anniversary solely under the auspicies of the ladies themselves.

Our Society has suffered severely during the last three years, having lost a number of subscribers by death and removal.

This year we invited Miss Gibson, of Albany, a returned missionary from Lucknow, India, to address us, to which request she kindly consented. To add interest to the services, hoping to "catch the unwary," four young ladies from the "Sunbeams" were invited to adopt foreign costumes and to take up a collection at the close of the addresses. Two young gentlemen clad, one in the garb of a Turk, the other in that of a Japanese, ushered the audience to their seats.

The church was prettily decorated with plants, and everything "went as merrily as a marriage-bell."

After the opening of the meeting by our worthy President, followed the reports of both Secretary and Treasurer, also the reading of a letter from our scholar in Chittoor, India.

Meanwhile our speaker had selected four young ladies and a little girl of about twelve, robed them in the dress peculiar to the country from which she had returned, representing respectively the women of high caste, low caste, the Mohammedan, the little widow, and lastly, but to us the most interesting, the Christian girl.

We need not tell you how she carried our hearts with her, how as never before we were allowed to enter into the trials and temptations of our down-trodden sisters. Truly our "hearts burned within us" as we listened to the oft-repeated story, seldom more eloquently uttered. I think there were some minds opened to the necessity of foreign missions, and we look forward to the coming year with hopefulness, praying that the Master will give us fresh zeal, not born solely from a sense of duty, but because it is a "loving service" we owe to Him who gave us the Gospel only a few years sooner than our unfortunate sisters.

The following Sabbath we were thrilled by the earnest, soul-inspiring words of our honored missionary, Dr. Chamberlain. The weather was unpropitious, the audience small, as it must necessarily be in the country at such seasons, but those who were privileged to sit at the feet of this loving teacher will not soon forget his enthusiasm in the work to which he has been ordained. There was only one criticism, and that the unusual one, "Too short; I could have listened an hour longer."

Surely we have eaten of the crumbs which fell from the Master's table. God grant they may give us new strength in the cause growing more precious to the Christian Church.

It is not that people do not believe in foreign missions; it is because they are ignorant of the work, and, therefore, do not know they are committing an actual sin in refusing to answer our appeals for aid. We all have great need to pray, "Oh Lord, open Thou mine eyes." Then, and not until then, will we comprehend our duty. L. B.

Sympathy.

SYMPATHY, the feeling with another heart in its mingled experience, whether glad or sorrowful, is a blessed power on the earth. "Oh! of what use is sympathy?" said one friend to another who was passing under the shade of a great and fearful grief. "If I could only do something for you, I would be so glad, but I can only press your hand and weep!" Only that, but it is enough. Nothing so lightens the pressure of a pain and ache that is wearing on the soul as the feeling that others are sharing the sorrow. That, though they cannot give back the lost darling, nor restore the light to the darkened home, nor lift up the load of care and relieve the suspense, they can give the sweetness of friendship, the trustful clasping of the hand, the kiss that tells love which the heart may be too full to speak. Nothing so intensifies the bliss of a joyful hour as the knowledge that somebody else is glad with us. When years ago our boys came home from the war, bringing their bronzed faces and their smoked and tattered battle-flags, more beautiful by far than when they went away, because they had been hallowed by valor and sacrifice, their triumph was the greater because the dear ones at home shared in it. While every window blossomed with smiling faces, and every heart sent up a cheer, and every step was greeted with delight, they felt that life had come to its climax. Sympathy was there, binding soul to soul, overcoming all discords, banishing repulsions, and knitting ties that could never be sundered.

Friends, whatever you do, never withhold your sympathy from those who need it. Is there, in your community, or in your street, or somewhere in your neighborhood, a tempted fellow creature, tempted by appetite, disheartened by falls? Do not despise him. Do not condemn him. Do not say, secure in your greater strength, that he is unworthy of a helping hand.

You have a rose-bush full of buds. The tiny veins, creamy-white or ruby-red, show through the little sheath of green. Another day of sunlight, another night of dew, and the bud will waken to the loveliest bloom. Now, shut it up in the dark, in the cold, away from the breath of the sunny air, away from the bath of the gentle dew—will it come out? No, you will have arrested its development. Not so are roses wooed to rich and queenly beauty. Try that process on the heart of your friend or on your little child. Many a child for lack of sympathy is hopelessly dwarfed and ruined. The capabilities are there, but the want of genial comprehension, of intimacy, of warm, sunny affection in the home, shuts them down and they wither in the bud. Timid boys grow untruthful, affectionate natures morose, because they are met with sternness when they ought to be treated with encouragement. Topsy, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was a good illustration of the power of a sympathetic nature over even a very rude and uncultured one. All Miss Ophelia's missionary work for the little waif, her teaching and training, was of slight avail, but when Eva put her arms around her, Topsy was won directly.

In our homes we seldom have to overcome resistance, but we often let the children slip away because we do not sympathize with them. We forget how we felt when we were young. We look at facts and fancies with eyes from which experience has swept the golden glamour, and we are intolerant where we ought to be patient. The generation which is coming on the stage elbows and crowds the one which has possession, and in each the personal feeling influences opinion and action. Youth and age sympathize more readily than youth and middle age, because the latter, outside the intensity of the struggle, has leisure to get the child-heart back again. D. L. C.

The Beautiful.

A TASTE for the beautiful may be cultivated. If one were so unfortunate as to have been born with no liking for what was lovely, it would be possible so to educate the mind, that the capacity for enjoyment would grow. But the love of beauty is natural, even to the youngest child. The baby, just beginning "to take notice," reaches out his little dimpled hand to catch the bright orange, or the parti-colored ball. A few months later, and he chases the sunbeams over the floor, and delights in pulling off the prettiest flowers that adorn the garden beds. Train this innate refinement, this looking toward the fairest and the best, and you will have the culture and artistic faculty by-and-by.

There is a mistaken impression that the beautiful is, necessarily, the costly. Extravagance and expense go, in their thought, hand in hand with pleasant adornments. Never was there a greater mistake. While thousands of dollars are yearly spent by the rich for pictures, ornaments, and articles of luxury, the really beautiful thing may often be had for almost nothing. A fine engraving may be obtained for a very trifling amount, in comparison with the value of the original. Though one might have to go without a gown, a shawl, or a hat, to obtain it, it were better economy to have on the walls a bit of bloom and sunshine, which should brighten up the rainy day, and cheer the dull one, even though for once fashion were neglected. A picture hung in your son's room, a vase of flowers on your daughter's table, are very little things, but they enter into the associations of home and make it precious.

In the hour of temptation, it may be well for your boy, if he can remember a home that was always sunny and cheerful, hallowed and blessed, and perhaps so slight a thing as the picture that hung on his chamber wall may have power to help him.

There is a great deal in growing up in a pure atmosphere, and the books, pictures, flowers, and personal habits of the inmates of a house go farther than superficial observers think, in the formation of character in the young who are dwelling there.

Flowers are cheap, but how rarely, perfectly beautiful! A bouquet on the mantel, a rose on the bracket, a cluster of pure blossoms in the invalid's room, how much pleasure and comfort, in a quiet way, they give.

Nothing so speaks to our hearts of our Father's ever-present love, as the flowers. Dimpling the clover-fields, spreading cloth of gold, as the dewy buttercups do, on the shining meadows, clambering over the rough mountain-sides, lifting their fearless faces in rough ravines—everywhere fragrant, everywhere beautiful, they seem to say to us, in our hours of gloom and weakness, "Why are ye timorous; why have ye so little faith?" "Consider the lilies, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." As a sweet poet has said for them, the dainty flowers say:

"Uselessness divinest
Of a use the finest,
Painteth us, the teachers of the end of use;
Travellers, weary-eyed,
Bless us far and wide;
Unto sick and prisoned thoughts we give sudden truce;
Not a poor town window,
Loves its sickliest planting,
But its walls speaks loftier truth, than Babylon's whole vaunting."

In the crowding tenement houses of the great cities, one sometimes sees, blossoming as lavishly and scattering fragrance as generously as if it were in a king's palace, a monthly rose, or a geranium, perhaps a vine, festooning the narrow panes, and giving God's grace of beauty to the toiling ones within. A lovely thought it was that, a year or two ago, suggested what was called the "Flower Charity," carrying flowers to the bedsides of the sick in hospitals, and up crazy stairs, and down into gloomy cellars, that the poorest of the poor might get a breath of the wide world outside, where daisies smile and mignonette and heliotrope send forth sweet odors.

What can we do to make home beautiful? Being a husband, for instance, you may at night carry home the sunniest smile, the brightest greeting to the wife who waits and listens for your step. Let the sound of your latch-key be to her the sweetest music. Never allow yourself to grow sullen, morose, and unapproachable, as you near the portals of the place you call home. It is an ill sign when a man's wife and children are not glad to see him, after the day's separation. Bring with you now and then the book you heard Emma say she wanted, the song Lucy will love to learn, the box of blocks for the three-year-old boy. Give your wife a knot of flowers, with the lover-like kiss that, of course, you never forget. Sweet courtesies and surprises of the courting days—do not despise them, now that courting is past and each is secure and happy in the possession of the other. It will be sweet if, when old age comes on, you can sing, as the dear little song has it:

"Ah! don't be sorrowful, darling,
And don't be sorrowful, pray,
Taking the year together, my dear
There isn't more night than day."

It lies naturally even more in the power of the wife than of the husband to beautify and glorify the common home. Perfect neatness and cleanliness lie at the very foundation of the beautiful in a house. A rag-carpet free from crumbs and shreds, shining windows, paint that shows no dingy spots, rooms in order, however plain, are really handsomer than the most gorgeous apartments littered with dirt and left in disorder. It is the wife's part to wisely arrange and economize, to spend and save the money which the good man earns. All his toil and effort will be neutralized, if she do not love her home, if she is not, in her own person, its beautiful, presiding genius.

Woman's kingdom lies within the four walls of her own home. A Christian woman desires no more influential sphere. THE FRIENDLY PHILOSOPHER.

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

Good Morning to God.

"OH! I am so happy!" the little girl said,
As she sprang like a lark from the low trundle-bed.
"'Tis morning, bright morning! Good morning, papa!
Oh, give me one kiss for good morning, mamma!
Only just look at my pretty canary,
Chirping his sweet notes, 'Good morning to Mary!'
The sunshine is peeping straight into my eyes—
Good morning to you, Mr. Sun, for you rise
So early to wake up my birdie and me,
And make us as happy as happy can be!"

"Happy you may be, my dear little girl,"
And the mother stroked softly a clustering curl.
"Happy as can be, but think of the One
Who awakened this morning both you and the sun."
The little one turned her bright eyes with a nod—
"Mamma, may I say then 'Good morning' to God?'
"Yes, little darling one, surely you may,
As you kneel by your bed every morning to pray."

Mary knelt solemnly down, with her eyes
Looking up earnestly into the skies;
And two little hands that were folded together
Softly she laid in the lap of her mother.
"Good morning, dear Father in heaven," she said,
"I thank Thee for watching my snug little bed;
For taking good care of me all the dark night,
And waking me up with the beautiful light.
O keep me from naughtiness all the long day,
Blest Jesus, who taught little children to pray."

MRS. HAMLIN, OF CONSTANTINOPLE.

Then and Now.

FOUR disconsolate little mortals—Alice, Margie, Hattie and Nan—sat in Margie's room one Wednesday afternoon fifteen years ago. Margie was the minister's daughter, and her mother, with the mothers of the other three girls, and many ladies besides, were downstairs having a missionary meeting. The children knew they must not make a noise, and they did not feel like playing with their dolls. They wanted to do "something 'portant," as Nan expressed it.

Suddenly Hattie exclaimed: "Let's have a missionary meeting just like they're having down stairs; we can sing softly and we can say the Lord's Prayer together."

"Yes, and we can give the pennies that Margie's mother said she'd give us if we'd keep real quiet," added Alice, with a happy smile.

Then small Margie, in her business-like manner, said: "That's a real nice plan, but we must 'lect officers 'fore we can have a meeting. I say that we have Hattie for President, because she's the oldest. She's twelve, you know. Nan and Alice, if you want Hattie for President raise your hands."

Quick as a flash up went two little hands, and by the same manner of voting Margie was chosen Vice-President, Nan was Treasurer, and Alice, Secretary. Hearing the other society, the one downstairs, singing a familiar hymn, the four little girls joined softly in that, and afterward, as Margie's mother was leading in prayer, they repeated reverently the Lord's Prayer. Then the question came up, Who would be the members of their society, since they were all officers? Alice suggested their dolls, but Nan said emphatically, "No! we must have real people. Let's each one of us bring another little girl next month when we have our meeting."

The President liking this plan, it was decided upon, but there were other questions to be settled. How often would they better hold their meetings? Like the other society, once a month? Margie said she thought they would better have them twice a month, and the others agreed. Alice suggested that each one give a penny at every meeting, and as much more as she could; to this, also, they agreed. Just then Hattie's mother called her, and the children knew they must "'journ," as Alice ——, whose father was a lawyer, said. With many promises of doing their best the children parted.

A year later in the minister's parlor was held the anniversary of the "Children's Society." From four, its numbers had increased to seventeen, while the Treasurer reported $7.19—every penny earned by the members, and in times when money was scarcer even than now. The mothers of the members were the only outsiders allowed, and none of these took part except Margie's mother, who had helped the little people in their arrangements and reports, and who made the opening prayer.

Even after this the society grew, and it was not long before it was recognized by the ladies' society as a great help, and invited to attend its meetings. But it is of the last annual meeting of the "Children's Society," as they still call it, (for even if the first members are grown up now, there are many children in it), that I want to tell you. It was held six months ago in the church of which Margie's father is still the minister. On a little platform, put up for the purpose on one side of the pulpit, sat the minister, the present officers of the society, and the first four members. Hattie was there in an invalid's chair, her white, sweet face showing signs of peace as well as of pain. Alice sat a little to one side, with an open note-book in her hand, for after many years she had again been chosen Secretary. As for Margie and Nan, they were together on the other side, Margie holding Nan's hand with a firmness that looked as if she never expected to have hold of it again. And that was very near the truth, for the next day Nan was to leave her home and the dear society to go as a missionary to India. This was her farewell meeting.

The services were short, and it seemed to all as if the time passed entirely too quickly. After it was over the other three went home with Hattie to spend the night, and to talk over the present, past and future.

The next day Nan left them to do the work that she felt was waiting for her. She has already written three times to the society at home, telling about her occupation and surroundings, and all the members look forward to her letters—the little ones as well as those who worked with her from the beginning.

Surely Nan is doing "something 'portant."

ELIZABETH M. CLARK.

The Story of Africa.

"WELL, I used to think no one could do two things well at once, but that boy seems to have managed it, and no mistake."

So spoke an English traveller who was inspecting one of the great cotton-mills in the west of Scotland, not far from Glasgow. And well might he say so. The lad whom he was watching—a pale, thin, bright-eyed boy, employed in the mill as a "piecer"—had fixed a small book to the framework of the spinning-jenny, and seemed to snatch a brief sentence from its pages every time he passed it in the course of his work.

"Ay, he's jist a wonder, yon laddie," answered the Scotch foreman, to whom the visitor had addressed himself. "We ca' him 'Busy Davie' here, for he's aye read-readin' like ony minister; but he does his wark weel for a' that."

"And does he really understand what he reads?" asked the Englishman, looking wonderingly at the young student's book, which was a treatise on medicine and surgery that would have puzzled most lads four or five years older than himself.

"I's warrant he does that," replied the Scot, with an emphatic nod. "There's no a quicker chiel than Davie i' the haill mill."

And then the visitor passed on to look at another part of the works, and forgot all about "Busy Davie" for the time being.

But he was suddenly reminded of him two hours later, when the mill hands "knocked off" for dinner. Coming back across the yard when his tour of inspection was over, the traveller caught sight of a small figure in a corner by itself, which he thought he recognized.

A second glance showed him that he was not mistaken. There sat "Busy Davie," holding in one hand the big oat-meal "bannock" that represented his dinner, and in the other a soiled and tattered book without a cover, which he was devouring so eagerly that his food remained almost untouched.

The Englishman stole softly up behind the absorbed boy, and glancing over his shoulder at the book, saw that it was one written by himself a few years before, describing the most perilous of all his journeys through the wild regions beyond the Orange river in South Africa.

Just as the visitor came up, the little student, quite unaware that the author of the book was standing beside him, read half aloud one of the more exciting passages, following the lines with his roughened fore-finger:

"'The progress of our party was necessarily very slow, as we could only march in the mornings and evenings, and the wheels of the wagons often sank up to the very axle in the loose sand. In some places the heat was so great that the grass actually crumbled to dust in our fingers. More than once our supply of water ran out altogether, and men and beasts staggered onward over the hot, dusty, never-ending plain, with parched tongues and bloodshot eyes, silent and despairing.'"

At the thought of these difficulties, which he himself was one day to meet and overcome as few men have ever done before or after him, the boy's thin face hardened into the look of indomitable firmness which was its habitual expression in after-life. But it softened into a smile the next moment, as he read as follows:

"'In several of the places where we camped our chief food was a species of large frog, called by the natives "mattlemetto," which was kind enough to assist us in our hunts for it by setting up such a tremendous croaking that we could easily find it, even in the dark.'"

Here the boy turned over a leaf, and came suddenly upon a startling picture of a man lying prostrate on the ground, with a lion's fore-paw planted on his chest, and its teeth fastened in his shoulder, while several negroes, with terrified faces, were seen making off as fast as possible in the background.

"How would you like to travel through a country like that, my lad?" asked the explorer. "It would be rough work, wouldn't it?"

"I wad like weel to gang there, for a' that," answered the boy, "for there's muckle to be done there yet."

"There is indeed, and it's just fellows of your sort that we need to do it," said the traveller, clapping him on the shoulder. "If you ever do go to Africa, I'll be bound it will take more than a lion in your way to stop you."

The whole world now knows how strangely those lightly spoken words were fulfilled twenty-eight years later, when that boy did actually come alive out of the jaws of the hungry African lion, which had broken his arm with its teeth, to finish those wonderful explorations that filled the civilized world with the fame of Dr. David Livingstone.—David Ker, in Harper's Young People.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The interests of education will be represented in The Youth's Companion during next year by Edward Everett Hale, by Gen. Francis A. Walker, by H. A. Taine, by James Parton, by Admiral David Porter, and by the Commandant at West Point.

....A Reminiscence of Archbishop Trench, by Prof. Roberts, D.D., with a portrait; a paper on The London 'Busmen, illustrated; A Boat Journey of Eight Hundred Miles in Africa, conducting a missionary party, by Captain Hore, also illustrated; the beginning of a story by Sarah Doudney, with other articles, give interest to The Quiver for December, which is the first number of a new volume

....The Church Review for November contains two very excellent articles. One by Dr. W. W. Olssen discusses the Origin and Composition of the Hexateuch as given by Kuenen and others, and shows clearly and soberly the flimsy basis upon which the extraordinary theory of the Higher Criticism rests. The other, entitled Views of the Atonement, discusses the position taken by a speaker in the last Episcopal Church Congress, holding only to a subjective influence, and denying the objective or vicarious force of the atonement. The writer, Dr. Walker, indicates with force and point the unsatisfactory and unscriptural nature of this position. The department of Contemporary Literature is as usual full and careful.

....The Magazine of Art, which begins a new volume with the present month, promises hereafter "an Etching, Steel Engraving, or Photogravure with each number" of the new year. The promise is fulfilled in the current number in an etching of Cecil Van Haanen's Venetian Bead Stringers. A very interesting biographical and critical paper on Van Haanen and his work follows. It has five engaging illustrations, one full page. The number contains also full-page engravings of Turner's Fighting "Temeraire" Tugged to Her Last Berth, and Courtois' Dancing Girl. The paper on Art in New Zealand, one of the series on the Colonial Exhibition, is amply illustrated. But the essay which will be most attractive to many readers is that treating of Old Blue-and White Nankeen China, with its fac simile illustrations in blue and white from pieces selected from some of the most famous collections.

....The Christmas (December) number of Harper's Magazine is perhaps not as showy in illustration as last year's, but it is even more attractive in the interest of its bountiful "table of contents," which we cannot even enumerate. It would certainly be impossible for us to select what we like best. The stories are varied, and all readable and in harmony with the season. We confess, however, that articles of the class of Gen. Lew Wallace's, "The Boyhood of Christ," are not altogether to our taste. We cannot help piously dreaming of our blessed Lord's life outside of the Gospel account of Him, but we shrink from putting down these fancies in deliberate print. Perhaps the gems of the number are the illustrations of "The Legend of St. Nicholas," "Inasmuch," "The Legend of St. Bernardo," and "Sally in Our Alley." It is a relief to find no serial stories or continued articles. Every family will brighten its holidays by getting this charming Christmas annual.

....Lippincott's Magazine for December gives its readers a complete novel by Mrs. Burnett, marked by all that writer's vividness of characterization and unflagging interest of narration. "Miss Lefarge" is the story of a miraculous little witch of a governess, who comes into the demoralized and bedraggled family of a dissipated and bankrupt nobleman, and sets things to rights and marries his son,—a sort of beneficent Becky Sharp. W. E. Norris's serial, "A Bachelor's Blunder," closes after a long career of somewhat languid interest. Junius Henri Browne defends "Newspaperism" against the scathing attack of Condé Pallen in the previous number—we wish we could say, effectually. E. P. Roe contributes a Christmas Story. John Habberton relates his literary experiences. Frank G. Carpenter has a curious and characteristic bit of gossip on, "The Presidents as Gastronomers." "Maid Marian," a somewhat sensational story, and other articles, make up the exceedingly readable mêlange for which Lippincott is becoming famous.

....The excellent literary features of Wide Awake have always made the magazine a favorite one with parents and educators. A valuable specialty among its announcements for 1887 is the "Longfellow literature," a group of articles embracing two from Rev. Samuel Longfellow, the poet's brother and biographer; "Longfellow's Boyhood" and "Longfellow with the Children;" also "An Old House," written by Harriet Lewis Bradley, the author of "A White Garden," in the forthcoming Christmas number of Harper's Magazine; this article describes the quaint Congress street house in Portland, Me., in which the poet grew up, and is to be illustrated from photographs made for the magazine in Portland. It was for Wide Awake, it will be remembered, that Whittier wrote his beautiful memorial poem on Longfellow's death, "The Poet and the Children," and it was Wide Awake which published the only account for children of the unveiling of the Longfellow bust in Westminster Abbey, together with Miss Guiney's poem on that event and an engraving of the first photograph of the bust sent over to America.

....American Art Illustrated is a new monthly which began its life in October. It is devoted to the fine arts as developed in this country, and is intended to furnish a complete record of the art activity of the present day. The co-operation of talented artists and critics has been secured, and each number will be well illustrated as well as contain an etching, engraving or photogravure as a special example of cotemporaneous art. The quarto form has been adopted, and the two numbers before us are certainly very handsome in their typographical appearance. A lovely etching faces the October number, and a steel plate "bird design" as well as a tint plate drawing are given with the magazine for November. The articles are brief but strong, and the illustrations are unusually effective. The very low price of subscription, two dollars and a half a year, does not permit of great size and renders necessary a certain dependence on advertisements which, by their artistic designs, somewhat confound the reader. We would suggest that these be kept in the back of the magazine. Beyond this we have little but praise to give this new venture, and commend it to the attention of all interested in the progress of art in the United States. It is published by the American Art Magazine Company, of the Studio Building, Boston.

PERIODICALS.

December.—St. Nicholas, American Agriculturist, The Missionary Herald, The Pulpit Treasury, The Forum, The Domestic Monthly, The Sunday-School World, Magazine of American History.

CALENDARS.—Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. offer eight calendars for 1887 at a reduced price, and arranged on a new plan. The card is, as heretofore, adorned with portraits and appropriate decorations in colors. The tablet is wider, has a leaf for every week instead of one for every day, and does not project as in former designs. It contains also nearly all the information usually given in almanacs. Each leaf has quotations from the author, whose name the calendar bears. Altogether these calendars are very pleasing and ornamental in appearance and very useful, surpassing in the latter quality any we have seen.

The admirers of Henry Ward Beecher will be gratified with "The Beecher Calendar" for 1887, published by Messrs. Cassell & Co. A very good portrait of the eloquent orator presides over the embellishments of the card, which comprise pictures of the churches of which Mr. Beecher has been pastor, of his birthplace and his summer retreat at Peekskill. Each leaf of the tablet bears a quotation from the words of the popular preacher.

"The Beecher Book of Days," made up after the manner of birthday books, with a blank after each day of the year for the entry of names and sentiments, and on the opposite memorable sayings by Mr. Beecher, compiled by Eleanor Kirk and Caroline B. LeRow, is a desirable companion to the calendar. It comes also from the house of Cassell & Co., which is a guarantee of good workmanship.

The Week of Prayer.

THE Evangelical Alliance of the United States suggests the following topics for the week extending from Jan. 2d to Jan. 9th, 1887:

SERMONS.—Sunday, Jan. 2: "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come."—Psalm 45: 2.

PRAISE.—Monday, Jan. 3: For rich spiritual blessings; for the long-suffering grace of God; for manifold temporal blessings, private and public; for many tokens of the mighty working of the Holy Ghost, both at home and abroad; for the increase of missionary zeal among Jews and Gentiles; for new openings for the spread of the Gospel in many lands; for the preservation of peace among the nations.—Psa. 111; Luke 1: 67–79; Deut. 32: 1–14; Psa. 116; 1 Chron. 16: 1–34; Psa. 107; 1 Chron. 29: 9–20.

HUMILIATION.—Tuesday, Jan. 4: For personal sins, family sins, and national sins; for the spread of unbelief and atheism in various quarters; for the fearful extent to "which the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," still prevail; for the large amount of intemperance, licentiousness, and other forms of immorality; for the formalism of many, and the cold indifference of others; for unseemly divisions and lack of love among those who are brethren in Christ.—Psa. 51; Jerem. 13: 15–27; Phil. 2: 5–16; Ezra 9: 1–15; 1 Cor. 5; Jude 1–16; 1 Cor. 2: 1–10.

PRAYER FOR THE CHURCH.—Wednesday, Jan. 5: That the people of God may know their high calling and responsibility; that they may be filled with the Spirit, and bring forth the fruit of the Spirit, and labor aggressively for the conversion of souls; that grace may be given to all pastors, teachers and preachers, to proclaim the Word in its simplicity and fullness, and that the Lord may open the hearts of men to receive it; that believers may walk in fellowship and holy love, remembering that they are one body in Christ, and members one of another.—John 17: 14–26; Ephes. 1; 1 Thes. 1; 1 Kings 8: 22–36; John 15: 12–21; Luke 6: 17–36; Ephes. 4: 1–16; Matt. 6: 5–34.

PRAYER FOR FAMILIES AND SCHOOLS.—Thursday, Jan. 6: That family love may be sanctified, husbands and wives walking together as fellow-heirs of the grace of life, and training their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; that the young may be early drawn to Christ, and kept from the evil that is in the world; that great grace may be given to all teachers of youth; that the blessing of God may rest on all schools, colleges, universities, and Sunday-schools; for all Christian associations of young men and young women; for the protection of woman and the home, the reformation of fallen men and women, and the equalizing of the scale of morality for both sexes; for all who are in affliction.—Deut. 6: 1–15; Prov. 4; Ephes. 6: 1–18; 1 Chron. 17: 16–27; 2 Tim. 1: 1–14; Coloss. 3: 12–25; Isa. 12.

PRAYER FOR MISSIONS.—Friday, Jan. 7: That the Church of Christ may recognize the glory of the commission to "preach the Gospel to every creature," and may feel it a privilege to make sacrifices that it may be fulfilled: that far greater zeal for the Divine glory and far more pity for the perishing may be imparted by the Holy Ghost to all the people of God; that faithful laborers may be greatly multiplied, and that all converts may be comforted, upheld, guided and made useful; that the hearts of the unconverted may be opened to receive the truth; that Christian missionaries may be favorably received by heathen rulers and peoples, and that native Christians among the heathen may be kept steadfast and made zealous in seeking the salvation of their countrymen; that God's ancient people, Israel, may acknowledge Christ as the Messiah; that the time may soon come when, according to prophecy, the Spirit shall be "poured out like floods upon the dry ground," and "the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." —Acts 2: 20–41; Isa. 44: 1–8; Matt. 9: 36–38; Rom. 11: 25–36; Isa. 35; Eccles. 11; Isa. 42: 1–16; Acts 10: 34–48.

PRAYER FOR NATIONS.—Saturday, Jan. 8: For the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the nations; for rulers and all in authority; for just and equal laws and righteous administration; for the better observance of the Lord's day; for the prevalence of the Spirit of Christ between employers and employed; that anarchism and all forms of lawlessness may pass away, and men live quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty; for peace among nations, and the removal of all race and sectional antipathies; for the abolition of slavery, the opium trade, the liquor traffic, and all other immoral trades and practices; for the blessing of God on all efforts to remove the curse of intemperance; for the cessation of persecution for conscience' sake, and of all oppression.—Psa. 67 and 96; Joel 2: 23–32; Rom. 13; 1 Thess. 5: 12–24; Zeph. 3: 14–20; Rom. 14; Matt. 7: 1–12; 1 Peter 2: 13–25; Hosea 14.

SERMONS.—Sunday, Jan. 9: "Thy Kingdom Come."—Matt. 6: 10.

TUESDAY, Nov. 30.

THE Bureau of Statistics gives the following report for October: Exports, $69,633,505; imports, $54,772,260; excess of exports, $14,861,245. For four months ending Oct. 31: Exports, $227,683,983; imports, $224,436,460; excess of exports, $3,247,523, or about one-half of the excess of the corresponding months of 1885. Deducting the freight charges, which nearly all go in the pockets of foreign steamship companies, the balance against this country amounts to many millions of dollars. For the four months the export of gold amounted to $1,878,448, against an import of $15,956,544; for ten months ending Oct. 31st it was: Exports, $40,623,630, against imports of $20,351,098. The figures for silver for ten months are: Exports, $21,350,874; imports, $13,406,507, which is a large sum for a silver-producing country, and leads us to ask, "Has the Government been buying silver from Europe?" The Bureau gives also the extent of immigration. For October it was 39,228 persons, against 25,887 in October, 1885; for the last ten months 333,948, against 294,575 for the same part of 1885.

At this port the imports of merchandise last week were valued at $6,145,502, and the exports at $6,231,473. Foreign exchange sold yesterday for $4.81 for 60-day bills and $4.84 1-2 for demand. The price is regulated by the purchases and sales of American securities on foreign account, and not by the imports and exports of merchandise and produce.

The Associated Banks reported for the week: Loans increased, $2,711,500; specie reduced, $1,555,700; legal tenders increased, $308,700; deposits increased, $861,000; surplus of reserve reduced, $1,062,250, making it $8,867,750. During the week the rate on money fluctuated from 4 to 20 per cent, the average rate being 6 per cent. The rate yesterday on call was 6 per cent. The Bank of England rate remains 4 per cent.

About 700,000 bushels of wheat were destroyed on Saturday night by the burning of two elevators at Duluth. The report of the visible supply in the United States and Canada, east of the Rocky Mts., made yesterday, showed, therefore, an increase of only 20,727 bushels of wheat, a decrease of 1,166,382 bushels of corn, and a decrease of 125,464 bushels of oats. The total visible supply is 59,572,078 bushels of wheat, 11,123,026 of corn, and 5,525,282 of oats. European stocks of wheat are reduced to a low point, and the markets there are firm. Quotations here for December were yesterday: Wheat 86 1-2, in Chicago 75 5-8; corn here 47 1-4, in Chicago 37 1-8; oats here 33 7-8, in Chicago 26 7-8. Hay and straw here are firm, with little change in value. Cotton closed here yesterday: Nov., 9.6; Dec., 9.9; Jan., 9.15–16; Feb., 9.25–26.

The Stock Market is firm and active. Some sales have been made to realize profits. The demand for the securities of Southern roads has diminished.

The steamer arriving on Sunday brought $704,200 in French gold.

MILLER.—Nov. 16, at South Bend, Ind., Mrs. Susan E. Miller, wife of Dr. A. G. Miller, aged 45 years.

VAN CLEEF.—In Jersey City, on Sabbath evening, Nov. 21, Theodore F. Van Cleef, aged 48 years.

Deceased was a partner of Mr. Jos. F. Sanxay in the gentleman's furnishing trade, at the old stand on Fulton street, N. Y., where he fairly won the esteem and confidence of a large number of ministers and members of the churches and business men. He was for thirty years a member of the Second Reformed Church of Jersey City, in which he had served as an officer, having the confidence of his brethren in his wisdom and Christian character. In his early life he had given up business to study for the ministry, but his health proving inadequate he was obliged to relinquish the work upon which his heart, in the warmth of early love, was fixed, and he consecrated his life to the glory of his Saviour in secular duties. He returned to the employ of Mr. Sanxay, his early friend, who always expressed the warmest regard for him. For several years he had contended with insidious disease which at last overcame him, and he yielded to the last enemy with a calm and fearless submission to the will of God. His death will be greatly deplored by a large circle who have admired and trusted in his unvarying integrity and affability.

AYER'S Sugar-Coated Cathartic PILLS.

If the Liver becomes torpid, if the bowels are constipated, or if the stomach fails to perform its functions properly, use Ayer's Pills. They are invaluable.

For some years I was a victim to Liver Complaint, in consequence of which I suffered from General Debility and Indigestion. A few boxes of Ayer's Pills restored me to perfect health.—W. T. Brightney, Henderson, W. Va.

For years I have relied more upon Ayer's Pills than anything else, to my bowels. These Pills are mild in action, and do their work thoroughly. I have used them with good effect, in cases of Rheumatism, Kidney Trouble, and Dyspepsia. —G. F. Miller, Attleborough, Mass.

Ayer's Pills cured me of Stomach and Liver troubles, from which I had suffered for years. I consider them the best pills made, and would not be without them.—Morris Gates, Downsville, N. Y.

I was attacked with Bilious Fever, which was followed by Jaundice, and was so dangerously ill that my friends despaired of my recovery. I commenced taking Ayer's Pills, and soon regained my customary strength and vigor.—John C Pattison, Lowell, Nebraska.

Last spring I suffered greatly from a troublesome humor on my side. In spite of every effort to cure this eruption, it increased until the flesh became entirely raw. I was troubled, at the same time, with Indigestion, and distressing pains in

The Bowels.

By the advice of a friend I began taking Ayer's Pills. In a short time I was free from pain, my food digested properly, the sores on my body commenced healing, and, in less than one month, I was cured. —Samuel D. White, Atlanta, Ga.

I have long used Ayer's Pills, in my family, and believe them to be the best pills made.—S. C. Darden, Darden, Miss.

My wife and little girl were taken with Dysentery a few days ago, and I at once began giving them small doses of Ayer's Pills, thinking I would call a doctor if the disease became any worse. In a short time the bloody discharges stopped, all pain went away, and health was restored. —Theodore Esling, Richmond, Va.

Prayer-Power.

THERE is an eye that never sleeps
Beneath the wings of night,
There is an ear that never shuts
When sink the beams of light,
There is an arm that never tires
When human strength gives way,
There is a love which never fails
When earthly loves decay.

That eye is fixed on seraph throngs,
That arm upholds the sky;
That ear is filled with angel songs,
That love is throned on high.
But there's a power which man can wield,
When other aid is vain,
That eye, that arm, that love to reach,
That listening ear to gain.

That power is prayer which soars on high,
Through Jesus to the throne,
And moves the hand that moves the world
To bring salvation down. —Selected.

John Bright on Sunday-Schools.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT, of England, speaking at a mission fair recently, said that the Sunday-schools contribute much towards the development of the moral feelings, and that the work performed by them was of more importance at the present moment than it had been at any previous period in English history. The powers of monarchs were lessening, and the influence of the aristocracy was fading away. The only power that was governing—a power that would henceforth be unlimited—was the power of the people. He claimed, therefore, that the most pressing need at the present time was political education, by which there could be cultivated in the minds of the people a sense of their moral responsibility. They should be taught that labor would have its just reward, and that the wealthy should be permitted to enjoy their riches in security. This is a sentiment worthy of Mr. Bright, and as suitable for this country as for Great Britain.—The Baptist Weekly.

The True Motive of Service.

WHEN a great citizen of Florence lay dying of the plague, deserted by his courtiers, abandoned by his family and friends, he appealed to a crowd under the window for some office of charity. "No," said one, "you are not rich enough to buy us. We will not give life for gold." But up started a young man and rushed through the crowd, exclaiming: "I will come in to you, not for money, but for gratitude; for I am one of those you saved from the death-block." That is the language of true Christian love. It says to Christ: "I will come to Thee, not for a great name, not for reward, not for praise, but because I am one Thou hast saved from death."

Obstacles in the Way of Converting the Heathen.

FEW of our people at home know of the obstacles that lie in the way of the missionary in his attempts to convert the heathen. It is not simply drawing them away from their powerful system of idolatry, and getting them to look at the crucified one. There are influences issuing from Christian lands, and professedly Christian men, that are quite as great hindrances as their previous system of ignorance and idolatry.

Opium, though cultivated and prepared in India, is wholly under the control of Christian England. The heathen know that it is one of the worst enemies of the human race, and they know equally well that it is not only manufactured and sold by men who profess the Christian religion, but that the profits of the trade go to enrich them.

Christian whiskey stands at a premium in all heathen lands. England and America are estimated as good countries in proportion as they supply the demand for strong drink. Not unfrequently is a ship seen anchored in one of the great rivers of the East, with the American flag floating at the masthead, loaded with hundreds of barrels of Cincinnati whiskey. This is to be scattered all over the country to do its work of death and block the way of the missionary. The imports into the Congo country during the year 1885 were twenty-two millions of dollars, of which one-half was rum from Christian countries. At the Berlin Conference, composed of representatives from nearly all the Christian powers, when the new Congo Free State Constitution was formed, Mr. Stanley used all his influence to prevent the importation of strong drink or spirituous liquors, but was over ruled by a majority of the representatives; and so the death-dealing flood is permitted to enter and do its blighting work.

But there is another hindrance, working even more disastrously to vital godliness, in the form of false Christianity. The heathen generally consider all white men Christians, and all who preach Christ or Christianity as missionaries of equal authority. The French Catholic priests take advantage of this, and profess to convert thousands of heathen whose minds are unenlightened and whose lives are not reformed. A missionary writing from Burmah, September 4th, 1886, says:

These French Roman Catholic missionaries are a class of men who have great facility in baptizing (as hey call their sprinkling ceremony). A man (Karen) with a lawsuit pending goes to the priest for help. "Yes, if you will come into my religion." The man will consent to anything for the sake of help; so the priest goes to the man's house and baptizes the man, his wife and five children, the old grandmother and young unmarried sister. To make the case stronger, the brother, next door, says he will come in, too. So the priest steps over and baptizes the brother, his wife and two of his children—the third, a boy, runs off and hides in a jungle to escape the ceremony. Thirteen in that batch. The priest does what he can for the case in court. Perhaps the man gains his lawsuit, and perhaps he doesn't. A cattle-thief is detected and wants a powerful friend in court; and his near relatives are anxious to save him from deserved punishment. So the priest gets a chance to baptize three families. In spite of all the priest can do the cattle-thief falls into jail; but the priest is able to report twenty baptisms, all the same. An old man is won over to the priest by his friendly ways and concludes to be his disciple, for friendship's sake, although he knows next to nothing about the Roman Catholic religion. He tells his wife to come with him, and she obeys. His children are grown up, but he succeeds in getting some of them to join him, with their families. So the priest baptizes from twenty to thirty in that lot.

The Roman Catholic Karens work and travel on the Sabbath as they please, and drink as much liquor as they like. The members of the Karen Baptist churches are required to abstain from intoxicating liquors, and to refrain from labor and travel on the Sabbath day; also, they must have an intelligent understanding of the way of salvation, and give satisfactory evidence that they have been born again, before they can be accepted for baptism. So it is easier for Roman Catholics to multiply baptisms than for us. But a large proportion of their converts do not stick, while the members of the Baptist churches generally hold out well.

From these statements it can readily be seen that missionaries have obstacles to contend with aside from those that are indigenous to heathenism.—Rev. Thomas Allen, in Journal and Messenger.

CENTRAL TRUTH. "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."—1 JOHN 3:2.

Introduction.

OUR last lesson was about the praises which Jesus the Lamb received when He came and took the sealed book out of the hand of Him who sat upon the throne, in order to open its seals and declare its contents. With the opening of each successive seal there appeared a vision, signifying some phase of the terrible conflict between Jesus and the prince of this world, but all pointing to the complete victory of the Lamb. The opening of the sixth seal indicated the near approach of the end, and before the last seal could be opened the redeemed of God were to be sealed, as His possession, and so secured from participation in the woes that should follow; as the children of Israel were defended from the plagues of Egypt. The four angels standing on the four corners of the earth (verse 1), appear to have been commissioned to destroy the earth at the appointed time, but another angel interposes, and commands them to wait until all the servants of God have been sealed in their foreheads. In the following verses the servants of God are represented as belonging to the tribes of Israel, but this probably refers to the spiritual Israel, the people of God out of every nation. The number, twelve thousand from each tribe, is probably used to indicate a very great number,—the entire body of the redeemed whom no man can number. Our lesson follows immediately upon this enumeration and gives us an even better idea of the multitude of the redeemed.

The Lesson.

I. THE MULTITUDE OF THE REDEEMED.—V. 9.

V. 9.—"After this I beheld." John had only heard the number from the different tribes, but now he is permitted to see the assembly of the children of God. "And lo, a great multitude, which no man could number." This is the explicit and complete fulfilment of the promise to Abraham that his seed should be like the sand, innumerable. "Out of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues." Even in the days of the Apostle the Church was gathering the Gentiles within her bounds, but this vision contemplated a broader work than that, even the work now being carried on throughout the world, as the Gospel is visiting every land, and proving God's message of salvation to men of every tongue and condition. "Stood before the throne and before the Lamb." Their position indicated that they had the consciousness of a right to appear in this high and holy place. To the Jew it was profanation for any but the high priests to stand in the presence of the Mercy-seat, which was the symbol of God's throne, but here, all the redeemed are permitted to have this honor. "Clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." The white robes indicated their victory over themselves; the palms their victory over the world.

II. THE PRAISES OF THE REDEEMED.—VS. 10–12.

V. 10.—"And cried with a loud voice." There will be no silent voices in the heavenly chorus, and no timid utterance when we there stand to tell what God has done for our souls. "Saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb." They ascribe the power and glory of their redemption to God alone through Jesus Christ. They say nothing of their faith or service or sufferings.

V. 11.—"And all the angels stood round about the throne." All the spiritual hosts of sinless ones are interested in our salvation; and we know that the angels are sent to minister to them who are heirs of salvation. It is no wonder, then, that in the hour of the saints' triumph they should be present and share in the blessed joy. They, with the elders and the living creatures, bow before the throne to join in the worship of those who have learned to know Jesus as they can never know Him.

V. 12.—"Amen; Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen." We cannot examine each phrase in this ascription, but simply note the number seven, indicating perfection, and the fact that these terms combine to express all of authority and majesty of which we can conceive.

III. THE BLESSEDNESS OF THE REDEEMED.—VS. 13–17.

V. 13.—"What are these which are arrayed in white robes?" This question of the elder was not asked for information, but in order to arouse the Apostle to consider the former condition of the saints, in contrast with their present blessedness.

V. 14.—"Sir, thou knowest." John, of course, had some idea of who this multitude were, but he desired fuller knowledge on the subject, and replied to the question in such a way as to elicit the declaration that follows. "These are they which came out of great tribulation." Not only the tribulation, or harrowing, of persecution, but all the discipline of life, and conflict with sin. "And have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." No trace of pilgrimage or battle remains on them. As the Hebrew children passed through the furnace without retaining so much as the smell of fire upon them, so shall we, when the hour of full and final conflict arrives, gain a complete deliverance from all power and trace of sin. The blood of the Lamb suffices to cleanse the foulest stain.

V. 15.—"Therefore are they before the throne of God." Because washed in the blood;—no other ground is sufficient to warrant a sinner's approach to the Divine presence. "And serve him day and night." Redeemed to service. In this service we shall find the highest delights and rewards of heaven. "He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them." The high priest could enter within the veil but once a year, but the dwelling place of the redeemed shall be the true Holy of Holies.

V. 16.—"They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more." If we would appreciate fully the force of this prophecy we must imagine ourselves among those exiled for the sake of the Gospel, without friends or resources, perishing for the necessities of life. "Neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat." This was good news to travellers accustomed to long and often terrible journeys over dry deserts under a burning tropical sun. All that this life has had of discomfort and suffering shall be forever done away.

V. 17.—"For the Lamb that is in the midst of the throne shall feed them." "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Even here our Saviour is our Shepherd. "Shall lead them unto living fountains of waters." On earth thirsty ones are often compelled to drink of muddy and brackish waters, but in heaven the springs of the water of life will be at hand to satisfy every thirsty soul. "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Tears of disappointment and grief, tears of penitence and suffering, all, all, shall be wiped away by the tender, loving hand of God. It is enough! "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him.

Lessons for To-day.

1 The cause of Christ is certain to succeed.

2. Labor for Christ is never thrown away.

3. The promises of God cannot fail of fulfilment.

4. Our love will increase as our knowledge becomes more perfect.

5. Only through the blood of the Lamb can we obtain entrance to heaven.

6. The presence of Jesus constitutes the blessedness of heaven.

7. In heaven we shall find compensation for every earthly loss.

8. We may by faith anticipate much of heaven's joy on earth.

Pegging Away.

Oh, well I remember the clustering faces,
That in wonderment peered through the shoemaker's door.
When to sound of his whistle, and tap of his hammer,
He often regaled us with bits of his lore.
As often he'd say, with a nod that was knowing,
And a smile that was bright as the sweet summer day,
"I tell you what, lads, there's nothing worth having,
But what you must get it by pegging away.

"You may run the swift race, and be counted the victor
And yet you but get there a step at a time,
And up the steep ladder where fame keeps her laurels
If you want to get one you must certainly climb.
The world, it is only a broad piece of leather;
We must shape it ourselves to our last as we may,
And we only can do it, my lads, as I tell you,
By pressing, and moulding, and pegging away."

Oh, the years have been long, and the shoemaker's vanished;
Adown the dark road, we must journey alone;
But often I think of the wisdom hid under
His whimsical jest and his fatherly tone.
And often I've proved the truth of his saying
As misfortune and I together still stray,
That all the best gifts the world has to offer,
It only gives those who keep pegging away.

— irch Arnold, in The Advance.

Boasting.

"BOASTERS are cousins to liars," says the proverb. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," says the Word of God. Nothing is to be gained but much may be lost, by boasting. Charles V., before he invaded France, ordered the court historian to obtain a large quantity of paper to record the victories which he was going to obtain. But he lost his general and a large part of his army by disease, and returned baffled, defeated and mortified.

Mrs. Judge B——, a wealthy and aristocratic lady of New Jersey, was one day sailing with a party of friends, when the subject of losing property was discussed. Mrs. B——, slipping a gold ring from her finger and dropping it into the river, said: "It is as impossible for me ever to become poor as for me to recover this ring." Not many days after, Mrs. B——'s cook came into the sitting-room and showed her a ring which had been taken from a fish. It was the ring she had dropped into the lake. Mrs. B—— died a pauper in Elizabethtown, N. J., and her husband died in the poor-house of an adjoining town.

Humility, and not boasting, is becoming in a Christian. Whatever you are, give all the glory to God. John Newton said: "I am not what I ought to be; I am not what I wish to be; I am not what I hope to be; but, by the grace of God, I am not what I was."—Selected.

Name of the Good Samaritan.

OBERLIN, the well-known philanthropist of Steinthal, while yet a candidate for the ministry, was travelling on one occasion from Strasbourg. It was in the winter time. The ground was deeply covered with snow, and the roads were almost impassable. He had reached the middle of his journey, and was among the mountains, and by that time was so exhausted that he could stand up no longer.

He was rapidly freezing to death. Sleep began to overcome him; all power to resist it left him. He commended himself to God, and yielded to what he felt to be the sleep of death.

He knew not how long he slept, but suddenly became conscious of some one rousing him and waking him up. Before him stood a wagon driver in his blue blouse, and the wagon not far away. He gave him a little wine and food, and the spirit of life returned. He then helped him on the wagon and brought him to the next village. The rescued man was profuse in his thanks, and offered money, which his benefactor refused.

"It is only a duty to help one another," said the wagoner. "And it is the next thing to an insult to offer a reward for such a service."

"Then," replied Oberlin, "at least tell me your name, that I may have you in thankful remembrance before God."

"I see," said the wagoner, "that you are a minister of the Gospel. Please tell me the name of the Good Samaritan?"

"That," said Oberlin, "I cannot do; for it was not put on record."

"Then," replied the wagoner, "until you can tell me his name, permit me to withhold mine."—Christian Leader.

Many indeed think of being happy with God in heaven; but the being happy in God on earth never enters into their thoughts.—John Wesley.

Dr. C. R. DAKE, Belleville, Ill., says: "I have found it, and it alone, to produce sweet and natural sleep in cases of wakefulness caused by overwork of the brain, which often occurs with active professional and business men."

Catarrh Cured

Catarrh is a very prevalent disease, with distressing and offensive symptoms. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives ready relief and speedy cure, from the fact it acts through the blood, and thus reaches every part of the system.

"I suffered with catarrh fifteen years. Took Hood's Sarsaparilla and I am not troubled any with catarrh, and my general health is much better." I. W. LILLIS, Postal Clerk Chicago & St. Louis Railroad.

"I suffered with catarrh 6 or 8 years; tried many wonderful cures, inhalers, etc., spending nearly one hundred dollars without benefit. I tried Hood's Sarsaparilla, and was greatly improved." M. A. ABBEY, Worcester, Mass.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

A Parable of Harvest.

WHAT hast thou in thy garner, husbandman?
Good grain and fair.
Then what are these black seeds full ill to scan?
Cockle and tare.

But tell me, O thou toil-bent husbandman,
How came they there?
They would not rise before the winnowing fan,
Despite my care.

But how did spring the cockle, husbandman,
And how the tare,
Thy goodly land to plague? Beneath a ban,
I sowed them there.

Declare whence came the seed, old husbandman—
With truth declare!
The grain my fathers had not skill to fan
Such fruit doth bear.
—Edith M. Thomas, in The Critic.

Playing Saloon.

"I HEAR that Smith has sold out his saloon," said one of a couple of middle-aged men who sat sipping their beer and eating a bit of cheese in a Smithfield street saloon the other night.

"Yes," responded the other, rather slowly.

"What was the reason? I thought he was just coining money there."

The other nibbled a cracker abstractedly for a moment, and then said: "It's rather a funny story. Smith, you know, lives on Mount Washington, right near me, where he has an excellent wife, a nice home, and three as pretty children as ever played outdoors. All boys, you know, the oldest not over nine, and all about the same size. Smith is a pretty respectable sort of a citizen, never drinks nor gambles, and thinks the world of his family.

"Well, he went home one afternoon last week, and found his wife out shopping or something of that sort. He went on through the house into the back yard; and there, under an apple tree, were the little fellows playing. They had a bench and some bottles and tumblers and were playing 'keep saloon.' He noticed they were drinking something out of a pail, and they acted tipsy. The youngster who was behind the bar had a towel tied around his waist and was setting up drinks pretty free. Smith walked over and looked in the pail. It was beer, and two of the boys were so drunk that they staggered. A neighbor's boy, a couple of years older, lay asleep behind the tree.

"'My God, boys, you must not drink that,' he said, as he lifted the six-year-old from behind the bench.

"'We's playing s'loon, papa, an' I was a sellin' it just like you,' said the little fellow. Smith poured out the beer, carried the drunken boy home, and then took his own boys in and put them to bed. When his wife came back she found him crying like a child. He came back down town that night and sold out his business, and said he will never sell or drink another drop of liquor. His wife told mine about it, and she broke down crying while she told it."

This is a true story, but the name was not Smith.—Boston Home Journal.

"Whiskey Did It."

THE last time I saw Dr. Bullard was thirty-four years ago in Washington City, attending the General Assembly. He was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, St. Louis, deeply interested in the new college near, of which two of his elders were trustees. One important part of his business East was to secure teachers for the college. The new railroad was near completion. The trial trip was to be made. Dr. B., his elders, trustees, and many others were invited "all aboard." They were almost flying, nearing the "gasconade." Dash! For an instant the timbers tremble. Crash! Dr. B. and his co-laborers are gone, while many others "fell as sudden, not as safe." Conversing with Prof. Darrah about the catastrophe, he said: "Whiskey did it."

Similar in character, and nearly contemporaneous, was the Norwalk (possibly Bridgeport) horror between New Haven and New York. It was said by the papers at the time that, as the train was nearing the fatal gap, the engineer said he thought the draw was open. "Go ahead," said the drunken conductor, "if you drive to ——." Whiskey did it. How about the steamer "Moselle," which at Cincinnati darkened the air fifty years ago by a shower of human flesh and mangled limbs descending on both sides of the Ohio. In a case of that kind now the question would be asked, "Was the captain sober?" Calamities like the foregoing may result from taxation or license, but from prohibition never.—*B. An Extraordinary Demand in the Field of the International Sunday School Lessons for 1887, and How it is Met.

WITH the opening of the new year the International Sunday-school lessons begin again the study of the Bible; the first six months of 1887 being given to lessons in Genesis and Exodus. There was never before so deep and so widespread an interest in the study of this portion of the Book of God; and no ordinary helps to study will now meet the demands of Bible students in America.

The progress of critical and of scientific research into the field of Old Testament study has perhaps been more active and more successful within the past seven years than in any former period of the same duration in all our Christian era. Only those scholars who are in the forefront of this movement of research are therefore now capable of meeting the intelligent and pressing demands of teachers who are desirous of knowing the truth in its fulness, and who would confirm the faith of the questioning among their fellow-teachers and their pupils. The Sunday School Times has arranged to meet this extraordinary demand, with lesson-helps of an extraordinary character.

No single critical scholar, however able, is sufficient to this emergency; hence the most capable scholars of the Old World and of the New are summoned to the aid of the readers of the Sunday School Times. The veteran Hebrew scholar, Professor Franz Delitzsch, of the University of Leipzig, Germany, who stands at the head of his branch of learning in all the world; Canon S. R. Driver, of the University of Oxford, England, who is foremost among Hebrew scholars in England; and Professor William Henry Green of Princeton Theological Seminary, who is the chairman of the American Company of Old Testament Revisers;—are, each and all, to supply Critical Notes every week during the six months of Old Testament Study. Oriental Lesson Lights will also be supplied by Hermann V. Hilprecht, a foremost Assyriological scholar from the universities of Leipzig and Erlangen; and by Professor Isaac H. Hall, the well-know Syriac scholar, of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. With these helps, readers of The Sunday School Times may be abreast of the best Christian scholarship of the age in the possibilities of knowledge concerning the Old Testament lessons of the year, in the light of modern research. Without their help, no American Sunday-school teacher can be as well furnished as he might be.

The Critical Notes on the New Testament lessons of the last six months of the year will be written by Professor Timothy Dwight, of Yale University, whose notes upon the lessons of the last quarter of this year have been so full of attractive instruction to the readers of The Sunday School Times.

But in addition to these helps to a critical study of the Bible text, there are to be helps to an insight into the spiritual teachings of that text, in a special article on every lesson of the year, week by week, from the pen of the Rev. Dr. Alexander Maclaren, the distinguished Baptist preacher of Manchester, England, who has no superior in his sphere in any land; while "Lesson Points"—doctrinal, ethical, and practical—will be suggested, in each week's paper, by Bishop Henry W. Warren of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and such familiar and helpful writers as Dr. H. Clay Trumbull of Philadelphia, Dr. A. F. Schauffler of New York, "Faith Latimer" of Louisville, Eugene Tappan of Boston, Miss Anna T. Pearce of Philadelphia, and others like them, will furnish their aids to the understanding and enforcement of every lesson.

Nor is this all. The Sunday School Times proposes to bring to the assistance of its readers the aid of the ablest Christian scholarship in the elucidation of the principal questions in present discussion, in connection with the Old Testament lessons for 1887. These questions are raised, and they must be met. Nor need any believer in the Bible have a fear as to the result of the fullest and most searching investigation at every point thus mooted. In addition to the critical notes, week by week, of the eminent scholars named above, special side-light articles, in illustration of the lesson themes, are already promised from the following-named specialists of the United States and Canada and England and Scotland and Germany:

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.—The Sunday School Times (16 pages) is published weekly at the following rates, which include postage:

One copy, $2.00 a year. The same price per copy for any number of copies less than five. To a new subscriber, half price ($1.00).

To Ministers, Missionaries, and Theological Students, $1.00 a year. To new subscribers half price (50 cents).

When the teachers of a school unite in subscribing for a number of copies, they can have the paper at the following low rates:

Five to nine copies, one year, $1.50 each for old subscribers, and half price (75 cents) for new. The total number of both old and new together to be not less than five.

Ten to nineteen copies, one year, $1.25 each for old subscribers, and half price (63 cents) for new. The total number of both old and new together to be not less than ten.

Twenty or more copies, one year, $1.00 each for old subscribers, and half price (50 cents) for new. The total number of both old and new together to be not less than twenty.

By a new subscriber is meant one who has not taken the paper at any time during the past two years.

Different schools are not to unite in the forming of a club, but each school should have its own club, at whatever price the number of copies taken entitles it, and the name of the school should be mentioned in the order.

For Small Schools.—By an equitable plan, the smaller schools, which cannot well form large clubs, have the benefit of the very lowest club rate. It provides that when the entire force of teachers in any school is less than twenty, the club rate to such school shall be $1.00 each to old subscribers, and half price (50 cents) for new, on condition that the order for the papers be accompanied by a statement that the number of copies ordered in the club is not less than the full number of teachers in the school.

Free Copies to Club Organizers.—Any person forming a club, whether of old subscribers, or of old and new together, or entirely of new subscribers at the half rate, is entitled to an additional copy free, excepting in the case of a club for less than ten copies formed on the "Small School" plan.

How Club Papers are Mailed.—The papers for a club will be sent either to the individual addresses, or in a package to one address, as may be requested. They should all go to one post office, excepting when the teachers of a school do not all get their mail from the same post-office.

Additions may be made at any time to a club—such additional subscriptions to expire at the same time with the club as originally ordered, each subscriber paying pro rata for the time that he is to receive the paper.

The half-rate plan has been adopted because of the belief that no more judicious advertising outlay could be made than one which secures a fair trial of the paper. A new subscriber is entitled to the half-rate for one year only. Those who, as new subscribers, have taken the paper during the past year at half rates, have paid less than the bare cost of the paper, presswork, and mailing, of the copies sent to them. They were not called upon to pay any part whatsoever of the general outlay for publishing,—such as that for editorial work, type-setting, and office expenses, although these items (without counting in presswork, paper, and mailing) amounted, for the year, to nearly fifty thousand dollars.

The paper will not be sent to any subscriber beyond the time for which it has been paid.

The issue for December 18 will contain the first lesson of the new year; and until January 1 the publisher will continue to start new subscriptions with that issue unless otherwise requested.

If you are inclined to form a club in your school, you will need no further information than is here given; although, if desired, specimen copies of the paper, and a package of subscription envelopes with the substance of the new year's plans printed thereon, will be mailed to you. Address, John D. Wattles, Publisher, 1031 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Important to Travellers.

When you visit New York stop at the Buckingham Hotel, Fifth Ave., kept on the European plan. Very centrally located for either transient or permanent guests; near the Grand Central Depot and quite accessible by either elevated or surface railroads, also by stages which pass the door every few minutes. This magnificent hotel is elegantly furnished and has splendid public parlors for ladies and gentlemen, smoking-rooms, billiard rooms, private dining-rooms, etc., etc. It has rooms varying in price from $1 per day upwards, also superior accommodations for families wishing to make either long or short stays. The restaurant is unsurpassed and the prices reasonable.

A Beautiful Home of Photography.

Fredricks' photographic gallery, corner of Broadway and Ninth street, is perhaps the handsomest establishment of its kind in this country, and we question if there is anywhere one that excels it in true artistic beauty. We do not propose to enter upon a description of the interior decoration of the building, as some idea of its magnificence can be obtained from the pleasing cut of the reception-room on the ground floor which appeared in our columns last week, but would simply suggest to all lovers of the beautiful in art the desirability of paying a visit to the place. As an artist in his branch of business, Mr. Fredericks has few equals and no superiors, so that everyone can feel assurred that all work done by him will give entire satisfaction.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE FOR 1887.—For more than forty years this standard weekly magazine has kept its readers abreast with the literary progress of the age. Its frequent issue and ample space render it an unrivalled compilation of a great and constantly growing literature which embraces the productions of the most eminent writers in all branches of literary and scientific work. It is indispensable to the American reader as the only satisfactorily fresh and complete compilation of this literature. Supplying the place of many reviews, magazines and papers, it enables one at small expense, considering the quantity and quality of the reading furnished, to keep pace with the best literature and thought of the time. Its prospectus for 1887 is worthy the attention of all who are selecting their reading-matter for the new year. Reduced clubbing rates with other periodicals are given, and to new subscribers remitting now for the year 1887 the intervening weekly numbers are sent gratis. Littell & Co., Boston, are the publishers.

A Holiday Suggestion.

At this merry season of the year, when we are all looking around for something or another suitable for the holiday gift season, it may not come amiss to direct attention to an adjustable folding-chair, with some fifty changes of position, and which is almost human in its operations. This chair is so easy of adjustment that a child can manage it, and the occupant change the back to any desired position while sitting in it. As a reclining-chair for the invalid it is invaluable. No lounge or easy-chair can compare with it for comfort and luxury. The head, back, limbs and feet are all supported, and the entire body reclines in entire rest. Mr. Joseph Plunkett, 112 West 14th street, New York, is the manufacturer, to whom all communications for circulars, price-lists, etc., should be addressed.

FOR DYSPEPSIA, INDIGESTION, Depression of Spirits and General Debility, in the various forms; also as a preventive against Fever and Ague, and other Intermittent Fevers, the "Ferro Phosphorated Elixir of Calisaya," made by Caswell, Hazard & Co., New York, and sold by all druggists, is the best tonic; and for patients recovering from Fever or other sickness has no equal.

Investments.

The attention of investors is called to the advertisement of the American Investment Company, of Emmetsburg, Iowa, with an office at 150 Nassau street, in this city. They have a paid-up capital of $600,000, with a surplus of $75,000, and are situated in the midst of the very best loaning sections of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, and Nebraska. They offer first mortgage farm loans paying 7 per cent. interest. They also issue 6 per cent. debenture bonds running ten years which have the security of their paid-up capital and surplus, together with the mortgage loans deposited with the Mercantile Trust Company of this city. Investors would do well to write to them for their explanatory pamphlet and reference.

$1,000 Reward

for your labor, and more, can be earned in a short time if you at once write to Hallett & Co., Portland, Maine, for information about work which you can do and live at home, whatever your locality, at a profit of from $5 to $25 and upwards daily. Some have made over $50 a day. All is new. Hallett & Co. will start you. Capital not required. All ages. Both sexes. All particulars free. Those who are wise will write at once and learn for themselves. Snug little fortunes await every worker.

Life, Health, Elegance, Durability.

This is the motto of Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets. These admirable corsets should be examined by every lady in the land. There is a great demand for them by all who have ever used them. Over three thousand families in the city of New York alone are now wearing them. They are double stitched and never are known to rip. They are made of English sateen in white and dove color; sizes, eighteen to thirty inches; all fine goods and exceedingly durable. The result is noticed very quickly after beginning to wear them, as the electro-magnetism acts quickly, generally the first week, but more frequently the first day, and often during the first hour they are put on. They cause the mind to become active, tone up the nerves and bring about a proper circulation. This may seem strange to the unbelieving—as there are many such in the world—and yet when one stops to think how universal electric treatment has become, it does not seem so wonderful after all. These electro-magnetic corsets are constructed on scientific principles, and therefore cannot fail to impart an exhilarating, health-giving current to the whole system. These corsets do not differ in appearance from all other corsets. The magnetism is conducted through the flat steel in place of the ordinary corset steel. The corsets are all equally charged, differing only in quality and design. Neither are they expensive. In fact they are remarkably cheap. Send for a sample and judge for yourself. Dr. Scott is reliable and you will get just what is represented.

For every variety and phase of the many diseases which attack the air passages of the head, throat, and lungs, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral will be found a specific. This preparation allays inflammation, controls the disposition to cough, and prevents consumption.

Best, easiest to use and cheapest. Piso's Remedy for Catarrh. By druggists. 50c.

Every day adds to the great amount of evidence as to the curative powers of Hood's Sarsaparilla. It is unequaled for general debility, and as a blood purifier, expelling every trace of scrofula or other impurity. Now is the time to take it. Sold by all druggists.

10,000 AGENTS WANTED!

DR. SCOTT'S ELECTRIC CORSETS AND BELTS.

Corsets, $1.00, $1.50, $2.00, $3.00. Belts, $3.00. Nursing Corset, Price, $1.50. Abdominal Corset, Price, $3.00.

Probably, never since the invention of Corsets, has so large a demand been created as now exists for Dr. Scott's Electric Corsets and Belts. Over three thousand families in the City of New York alone are now wearing them daily. Every Man and Woman, well or ill, should daily wear either the Corset or Belt.

OUR CORSETS ARE DOUBLE STITCHED AND WILL NOT RIP.

If you have any pain, ache, or ill-feeling from any cause, if you seem "pretty well," yet lack energy and do not "feel up to the mark," if you suffer from disease, we beg you to at once try these remarkable curatives. They cannot and do not injure like medicine. Always doing good, never harm. There is no shock or sensation felt in wearing them. There is no waiting a long time for results; electro-magnetism acts quickly; generally the first week, more frequently the first day, and often even during the first hour they are worn, their wonderful curative powers are felt. Every mail brings us testimonials like the following:

The mind becomes active, the nerves and sluggish circulation are stimulated, and all the old-time health and good feeling come back. They are constructed on scientific principles, imparting an exhilarating, health-giving current to the whole system. Professional men assert that there is hardly a disease which Electricity or Magnetism may not benefit or cure, and they daily practice the same, as your own physician will inform you.

THE CELEBRATED DR. W. A. HAMMOND, of New York, formerly Surgeon-General of the U. S. Army, lately lectured upon this subject, and advised all medical men to make trial of these agencies, describing at the same time most remarkable cures he had made, even in cases which would seem hopeless.

The Corsets do not differ in appearance from those usually worn; we substitute our flat steel magnetods in place of the ordinary corset steels. These Corsets are nearly all equally charged, differing chiefly in quality and design. They are elegant in shape and finish made after the best French pattern, and warranted satisfactory in every respect. Our Belts for both gents and ladies are the genuine Dr. Scott's, and are reliable.

The prices are as follows: $1, $1.50, $2 and $3 for the Corsets and $3 each for the Belts. The accompanying cut represents our $3 Abdominal Sateen Corset. We have also a beautiful French shaped Sateen Corset at $3 and a short Sateen Corset at $2. The $1 and $1.50 goods are made of fine Jean, elegant in shape, strong and durable. Nursing Corsets, $1.50; Misses, 75c. All are double stitched. Gents' and Ladies' Belts, $3 each; Ladies' Abdominal Supporter, an invaluable article, $12. We make all these Corsets in dove and white only. They are sent out in a handsome box, accompanied by a silver-plated compass by which the Electro-Magnetic influence can be tested. We will send either kind to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price, with 20 cents added for packing and registration, and we guarantee safe delivery into your hands. Remit in Post-office Money-order, Draft, Check, or in Currency by Registered Letter at our risk. In ordering kindly mention THE INTELLIGENCER and state exact size of corset usually worn. Make all remittances payable to GEO. A. SCOTT, 842 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

VOL. LVII.—No. 49. WHOLE No. 2941. | NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1886. | $2.65 A YEAR IN ADVANCE. No. 48 CHURCH STREET.

EDITORS: Rev. JOHN M. FERRIS, D.D. Rev. N. H. VAN ARSDALE.
ASSOCIATE EDITOR: MRS. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

"THOU shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear," was the command of God to a prophet at a time when Israel was breaking loose from the "thus saith the Lord." The Apostle to the Gentiles declared to the churches of Asia, "I have not shunned to declare unto you the counsel of God." Is there not need at present to proclaim the words of God even though they are distasteful to men, though men reject them, abuse the preacher who declares them and endeavor to destroy his influence? Have not the greatest triumphs of the truth occurred when the Church has firmly held and clearly declared the holiness of God's nature and the perfect righteousness of His government, the certain punishment of sin, the dishonor and baseness and vileness of sin in the sight of the Lord? Has not the Church been strongest when upholding truths men have hated and resisted, even though the Church then has been abused, misrepresented, ridiculed and opposed? Is there not at present too much regard paid to pleasing men and too little to a faithful declaration of the words and counsel of God?

THE MISERY produced by an ill-advised strike is tersely and vigorously declared in the recent report of Mr. Frank A. Flower, the Commissioner of Labor and Industrial Statistics for Wisconsin. After describing the anarchical outbreak of Polish rioters which resulted in the deaths of several men, he speaks of the eight-hour agitation which threw 13,000 employees out of work and cost the State at least $2,000.000, and adds this sad and graphic summary of the results:

"Houses remain unpainted and fences unrepaired; last year's suit of clothes is made to answer for the present season; the sewing machine bought on the instalment plan is taken away; pawnshops have been doing a thriving business; interest payments have lapsed; insurance policies have been forfeited; wife and children are without new dresses; furniture has gone to the second-hand store; lot sales to workingmen ceased for weeks and months; chattel mortgages increased to an unusual number, and domestic hard times that the public can never see or know prevailed in many quarters with painful severity, while a sullen and morose spirit is discernible at home, in the shop, on the street, and even in the saloon when discussing the things that have happened, the present phase of the labor question or the programme for the future."

THE PROPHETIC CONFERENCE held in Chicago last month, in the interest of premillenarianism, drew together a company of able ministers. Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, of Chicago, opened the discussion with an argument to prove that the Scriptures foretold the personal, visible second coming of our Lord, to usher in the thousand years of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." A large audience gathered to hear the Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon describe Modern Delusions, and the Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Philadelphia, received profound attention as for an hour and a half with "brilliant and fervid oratory" he treated Our Lord's Second Coming a Motive to World-Wide Evangelism. Bishop W. R. Nicholson set forth the Messiah's Kingly Glory; Rev. J. T. Duffield maintained that The Apostolic Church was Pre-Millenial, and the Rev. Dr. Geo. S. Bishop, of Orange, N. J., described The Times of the Gentiles. A score of ministers not less prominent read papers and participated in the discussions. The Conference made no attempt to fix the time of the Lord's coming, only insisted that He will come in person and reign on the earth. Another position taken was that the world will not be converted until the Lord comes; that superstitions, delusions, unbelief, will continue until they are rebuked and banished by the presence of the Lord. Meanwhile the Gospel is to be preached in every land for a witness, and will be attended with great success, but the conflict between truth and error will not cease, nor will error cease to be mighty and to hold millions in servitude. Whether those brethren are right or wrong, and some of their expositions seem strained and others fanciful, it is still plain that their opinions upon this great matter do not quench their zeal in all aggressive Christian work or their hearty interest in the evangelization of the world. Whatever may be the truth respecting the coming of our Lord, the duty of the Church is plain—to preach the Gospel to every creature.

Blessed is he that considereth the poor:
The Lord will deliver him in the day of evil.
The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive, and he shall be blessed upon the earth;
And deliver not thou him unto the will of his enemies.
The Lord will support him upon the couch of languishing:
Thou makest all his bed in his sickness.—Ps. 41: 1-3.

THE cold weather has come, the poor are beginning to suffer, Out-door work has nearly ceased, and the unemployed are crowding the places where the relief of their wants can be obtained. They have been improvident! Yes. Sometimes the wife has been, sometimes the husband. The industrious and prudent and efficient partner of the domestic firm has struggled patiently and often heroically with the self-indulgent and wasteful member. Whatever has been the cause, the family has no money, no food, no fuel, is scantily clothed, and work is hard to get at this season. They are not to be allowed to starve or freeze, or to contract chronic and disabling disease through lack of food and fire. The children, whatever they may become, have not been guilty of the misdeeds which have resulted in their present destitution, and are to be cared for. It was a good custom years ago among the churches to inquire into the poverty of the town and provide for it. It has fallen into disuse because the population has outgrown the ability of separate churches and no organization has been made of all the churches of the town or village to visit and relieve the poor. Would it not be wise to make such an organization to watch over, visit and provide for the destitute? Would it not establish desirable relations between the churches and the unfortunate or improvident? Certainly opportunity would be afforded to cheer as well as help the one and to counsel the other, and it might attract the visited families to the services of the church and result in souls becoming new creatures in Christ.

In the city it is hard to tell what to do. Impostors abound. To give is often the most unwise thing to do. Happily there is an agency which is eminently trustworthy, has the accumulated experience of years spent in dealing with the poverty of this great city, and is commended to the good will of benevolent citizens by the judgment and efficiency with which its work has been administered. "The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor" is now in its forty-third year of beneficent effort. It was organized by those who were regarded as among the best citizens of the metropolis, and has continued to this day under the management of that class of men. The President is James Gallatin; the Vice-Presidents, Howard Potter, Robert Lenox Kennedy, Adam W. Spies, Joseph W. Drexel; the Treasurer, Robert B. Minturn; the Recording Secretary, R. Fulton Cutting; the General Agent, John Bowne. Among the Managers, besides the gentlemen already named, are such men as John L. Cadwalader, William Jones, John Paton, Rutherfurd Stuyvesant, John Thorne, and six or eight other citizens of equal worth and standing. The work of the Society is conducted on a system developed by experience. All applicants for aid are visited. The visitors last year made 10,131 visits at the homes of the poor. A Medical Inspector is employed and a Sanitary Agent. These servants of the Society have effected improvements in the plumbing and drainage and ventilation of hundreds of dwellings and apartments. Last year 951 complaints of nuisances were received, examined, and every effort made to abate the offence. All these agents, the visitors, the medical men, the general agent, are persons who have become familiar with the destitution of this city by contact with it for years. In 1885, chiefly during the winter months, 8,997 separate families received relief from this source, and 4,838 meals and 1,795 lodgings were furnished by orders on reputable lodging houses. About $30,000 were received and expended, showing that the management is prudent, for the average cost of timely and sufficient relief was less than four dollars to a family. The Society has been doing its work very quietly and altogether without ostentation. It is commended by one man who has learned the wisdom and efficiency of its management, to his benevolent neighbor who wishes to relieve those worthy of help, has been deceived by impostors, and is looking about for some proper way to gratify his generous intentions; and so the company of its supporters has been maintained. It is commended to the readers of the INTELLIGENCER in this city and its suburbs. Cannot such a society look with propriety for gifts from those who do business in this city, earn their fortunes here, while they reside in neighboring towns? Should they not bear some part of the city's burdens? The office of the Association is at 79 Fourth avenue.

Communism.

THE United Labor Party of this city adopted last week this platform:

That Governmental corruptions and injustices spring from neglect of the self-evident truth that all men are created equal; that the advantages arising from social growth and improvement belong, of right, to society at large; that in the drawing of grand jurors there should be no distinction of class; that the property qualification for trial jurors should be abolished; that equal pay for equal work should in public employment be accorded without distinction of sex; that police interference with peaceful assemblages should cease; that our elective methods should be reformed; that the people of New York should have full control of their own local affairs; that the procedure of our courts should be simplified; that the laws for the safety and sanitary inspection of buildings should be enforced; that all laws which bear unjustly on labor should be abolished; that in public work all labor should be directly employed; that all taxes on buildings and improvements should be abolished; that all taxes should be levied on land values which arise from and are due solely to increase of population; that existing means of transit should no longer be left in the hands of corporations, but should, by lawful process, be assumed by the city and operated for the public benefit; and that the true purpose of government is the maintenance of that sacred right of property which secures to every man the fruits of his own labor.

In essence that declaration of principles is communistic. It does not secure liberty for any man. It destroys individual skill, individual enterprise, and individual responsibility. It introduces the despotism of the community; the despotism of a machine. It makes each man but a part of a machine. Striking at contract work or work by the piece, it aims to reduce all men to the same level. The fast workman and the slow, the skilful and the unskilful, the enterprising and the sluggish are to be placed on the same footing, and to be paid by the hour, and not by the amount of work done or according to the way in which it is done.

The taxation of land proposed amounts to confiscation. No man would hold land under the conditions. The land would become the property of the State, the community, and that is what Mr. George intends and all who agree with him. Besides, the clause on land is disingenuous. It is not aimed at land-holding in general. These men have not the least intention to become farmers. It is next to impossible to get the most of them out of the city. The declaration is aimed at city lots.

The clause in regard to the interference of the police with peaceable meetings is also disingenuous. It applies properly to meetings to devise the use of violence to attain desired ends, to hold also anarchic meetings to prepare for indiscriminate arson and assassination. The police do not interfere with peaceable meetings.

A large part of this platform is out of place in this country. It is a development of a movement imported into this country by men who had been foiled in Europe and who formed organizations here on the ground that the conditions here were the same as those existing in Europe, which has not been and is not now true.

The history of the matter in outline is this: In 1820 George Henry and Frederick W. Evans came to this country from England. Almost immediately they began a wage-earners' agitation and a land reform. The "Vote Yourself a Farm" cry originated with George H. Evans. At that time there was not a section of the footstool of God where their notions were so utterly without justification in existing facts as was this. A large proportion of the workingmen of that day were acquiring homes; those who did not were themselves alone to blame. Indolence and self-indulgence were in the large majority of cases the causes which prevented mechanics and wage-earners from accumulating property. Frederick Evans joined the Shakers at Lebanon in 1831, where he has been known for years as Elder Evans.

Socialism was introduced into this country somewhere about 1845 to '48 by Wilhelm Weitling, a German tailor, who, after several arrests in Germany for his revolutionary opinions and acts, was released from prision on the condition that he would emigrate to America. Dr. E. J. Kock, also a German revolutionist and a refugee, co-operated with Weitling. Their communistic ideas were adopted by the Turnverein, and were combined at the time with a great deal of scepticism and atheism.

All of these men proceeded on the ground that the conditions here on which property was held and under which workingmen were engaged were the same as those existing in Europe. That fact alone ought to have been enough to lead to the rejection of their theories, for nothing in the case could have been farther from the truth.

Now, to-day, the main support of the Unions and of the Assemblies of Knights is derived from foreigners who are assuming that the laborer here is working under just such conditions as prevail in Europe. To a large extent the assumption has no basis of fact; the support it seemingly has from facts existing here being derived from exceptional instances and not from the overwhelming majority, —the prevailing rule,—of facts in regard to property and labor. These very men never before in their lives have earned such wages as they are even now earning, never before had such good clothing and so much of it, never before such a variety and supply of nutritious food, never before have lived so well.

HARD STUDY. — President Robinson, of Brown University, in an article which he publishes in the Forum, entitled "How I was Educated," uses some plain language about the kind of young men who are sent to college as being especially fitted for the ministry. He speaks first of the disadvantages which he labored under upon first entering college because of the incompetence of the teachers who had prepared him, and then says:

To add to my misfortune, the most intimate of my friends, though pure in their lives and morally wholesome as associates, were low in their aims as scholars, satisfied with very little and very superficial work. They had been sent to college to prepare for the ministry, and were fair specimens of the average of a class of men not yet wholly extinct. Selected, and aided by beneficiary funds, as "candidates for the ministry," they seemed to regard themselves as absolved from the duty of high aims as scholars, and dropped into the wretched cant of "laying aside ambition as unworthy the servants of the Lord."

It was every way worthy of the keen and candid President of Brown to put the stamp of reprobation upon this kind of cant. Too often a religious pretext has been sought for mental torpor and cowardly indolence. The best that men can do is poor enough for an offering to the Lord; but deliberately to give the least is an offence to decency. It is sometimes said that the Lord has no need of men's learning; but it is even more true that He has no need of their ignorance. The priest's lips should keep knowledge. Paul was the only liberally educated of the apostles, and what a difference was there between his life-work and theirs.

Weaving.

YES, I'm a weaver, and each day
The threads of life I spin,
And be the colors what they may,
I still must weave them in.

With morning light there comes the thought,
As I my task begin—
My Lord to me new threads has brought,
And bids me "weave them in."

Sometimes He gives me threads of gold,
To brighten up the day;
Then sombre tints, so bleak and cold,
That change the gold to gray.

His love, alas! I oft forget
When these dark threads I spin,
That cause me grief and pain, but yet
He bids me "weave them in."

And so my shuttle swiftly flies,
With threads both gold and gray;
And on I toil till daylight dies,
And fades in night away.

Oh when my day of toil is o'er,
And I shall cease to spin;
He'll open wide my Father's door,
And bid me rest within.

There safe at home in heavenly light,
How clearly I shall see
That every thread, the dark, the bright,
Each one had need to be!

"Old Colony" Papers.

Pontius Pilate.

I.

THE exhibition of Munkacsy's great painting of "Christ before Pilate" has awakened a new interest in the personality of the latter, as well as of the entire group of conspirators who have been photographed for eternal infamy in the intense light of that presence.

The previous history of Pilate is obscure. "Pontius" may indicate his alliance with the distinguished family of the Pontii at Rome, or may have been bestowed upon him for service to the State or military exploits in Pontus. His office of Procurator was properly a civic function, as distinct from that of proconsul, but sometimes as in this case carried with it the powers of military governor. Though his headquarters was at Cæsarea, he was often at Jerusalem, especially during the tumultuous seasons of the great Jewish festivals. It was on one of these occasions that the scene occurred which was to make him famous when Tiberius should be but a name, and which was to identify him with the pivotal event of time and incorporate his name in the universal creed of the future. We are not apt to recognize the critical moments of life, when they come. Pilate only saw those annoying priests and those turbulent people dragging a culprit, with more than usual outcry and animosity, to his judgment seat.

Waiving, in his politic way, the question of etiquette arising from their sanctimonious scruples about venturing into a Gentile's house during the Feast of Unleavened Bread, he meets them on the tesselated pavement outside of the palace. He ascertains that the man before him—a Nazarene, named Jesus—has already been condemned by the Sanhedrim, and they have come to him to execute the sentence. He is too much of a Roman to give a careless approval, and demands to know the charge. The wily priest, Caiaphas, who was evidently the animating and governing mind in this whole transaction, knew that Pilate would care as little for Jesus' orthodoxy as Gallio afterwards did for Paul's. So he concealed the fact that the accused had been tried only for blasphemy in claiming to be the Son of God, and trumped up a story about his pretending to be a king and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar.* Pilate knew well that their sudden horror of treason was a mere pretext on the part of these turbulent and troublesome men, and that they had their own reasons for wanting the life of this man. So to bring out their bloodthirstiness, and also to enjoy their humiliation in confessing their subjection, he said with an ill-concealed irony: "Take him and judge him according to your law." To which they were obliged to reply, "It is not lawful for us to put anyone to death."

That he may not appear lacking in zeal and vigilance for his master, Pilate holds a private interview with the man, asking him bluntly, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" By this he meant to indicate one of those fanatical agitators who were constantly springing up among this people and inciting them to revolt. Jesus utterly disavows any such application of the name, and explains that His kingdom is purely a spiritual one, as might be seen from the fact that his followers were anything but fighting men and had not even resisted His deliverance to the Roman authorities. "You are a king, then?" asks Pilate. Jesus assents, but asserts again in more explicit terms, My kingdom is the realm of truth, and my subjects are all those who will listen to the truth and obey it in the love of it.

And then there starts to the lips of the Governor a careless and half-sarcastic question, which reveals the secret of his heart, showing it to be a weary and sunless void, full of all skepticism and the dead men's bones of a materialistic philosophy. It lights up not less the heart of the whole Roman world of which he was the representative, where already a decaying faith was eating out the stern virtues which had nursed its early strength. Truth! What is truth? he cries. As much as to say: You are entering now upon a dim, unknowable territory. Enough for me to grasp the tangible and the seen. So long as I may retain the favor of my imperial master, what have I to do with misty abstractions and airy nothings, about which the wisest only agree in calling them by that delusive name "truth?" And the Governor, a shade more thoughtful than before, returns to the throng outside and reports: I find no fault in him,—he may be wrong-headed with respect to your religion, and doubtless is an enthusiast, but I find in him no treason to the State.

So spake the native justice of the man, and his only course was to dismiss the charge as frivolous and malignant. But the priests' party were too determined, and too ready with expedients, to let their prey thus escape. Through their instigation, symptoms of disturbance began to show themselves among the gathering populace. Pilate was not a brave man And these indications, instead of arousing the pride of a true Roman knight, caused him to linger and parley with the crowd.

He turns to Jesus, standing in dignified silence as if He and not Pilate were the judge. "Answerest thou nothing?" he demands. But he extracts not word from Him who had taught His disciples, "Cast not your pearls before swine." That majestic reticence should have been a sufficient rebuke to Pilate. and ended his unmanly indecision. It was as much as to say: You have pronounced me innocent of this charge; what farther justification is needed? And what is the one thing which remains for you to do?

A gleam of light breaks upon the Governor's perplexed mind. The accusers have mentioned Galilee as the scene of the alleged seditious practices, and he catches at the word. For Herod Antipas, the Tetrarch of Galilee, is at that very moment in Jerusalem. On the ground of jurisdiction he will shove off this case on Herod, and at the same time soothe that official's offended dignity at past interferences. And he hurries Jesus away to the Tetrarch, and with a lighter heart goes about the day's affairs. But the respite is of short duration. Erelong the mob, tenfold greater than before (for it is no longer early morning, and the thing has become noised all over the city) gathers about his doors, and a clamor louder and fiercer assails his ears. Caiaphas and the whole body of priests and elders of the Sanhedrim are there, with the city rabble at their heels. Jesus too is there, arrayed in the tinsel of a mock royalty, and showing the marks of recent ill-usage. The frivolous Herod, finding that the prisoner was not disposed to gratify his curiosity by working miracles, had diverted his royal self and his body-guards with insulting the crownless king, and sent him back. And the problem is once more for the Procurator's more serious mind, but not less feeble nature, to solve.

What shall he do? Like all to whom truth is secondary to expediency he proposes to compromise. After reciting that both he and Herod had "found no fault" in Jesus "as touching the things whereof ye accuse him," he adds, "I will therefore chastise him, and release him." Which was equivalent to saying: This is an innocent man, and he ought to go clear at once. But for policy's sake, when it shall be reported at Rome,—and likewise to make everything agreeable between myself and you, gentlemen of the mob,—I will inflict a flagellation; and you, my good rabble, will please be satisfied with that!"—Not the first time, nor the last, that the rights of an innocent third party have been sacrificed to make harmony between two contestants.

The usual fate of timid compromises with the wrong was the only result. Caiaphas, with that devil's glance of his, saw the character he had to deal with, and was not slow to follow up his advantage. Pilate had yielded the essential thing, the claim of the innocent to an absolute acquittal, and the rest was only a question of pressure and temptation. The priests and scribes become busier than ever among the crowd, and soon all are instructed in their parts in this farce of justice, this tragedy of murder and intimidation.

His offer of compromise not being accepted, Pilate resolves to appeal to the people, for he has heard that Jesus has been a friend and benefactor of the masses. He tries an artifice, which under ordinary circumstances would have been sure to succeed. Taking advantage of a questionable custom, said to be commemorative of the Hebrews' release from Egypt, he proposes to liberate a prisoner of state. With a view to securing the escape of Jesus, he gives the populace their option between Him and probably the most dangerous and desperate enemy of the public peace then in durance, one Barabbas, who is characterized as a thief, a rioter and a murderer. But the tide of Jesus' popularity had long since turned. They had settled it in their minds that He had no design of doing the very thing they were now accusing Him of, namely, a revolt against the empire and a restoration of the Davidic kingdom. Besides, had He not been solemnly condemned by that great spiritual court, which represented to the Jew the last vestige and intrenchment of national independence? And the ignoble rabble, always ready to be turned by demagogues and blind guides against their true friends, were not a whit behind their leaders in eagerness to destroy the Nazarene. And an apparently unanimous response goes up, "Not this man but Barabbas!"

The Governor, whose gentile education rendered him incapable of understanding the secret springs of motive which were working in these Jewish breasts, cannot believe his ears. He puts the question again, asking in addition what he should do with this "king of the Jews." And again the astounding and suicidal cry goes up from that priest-ridden multitude, with an increasing ferocity and definiteness, "Crucify him, crucify him!" "Why, what evil has He done?" urges the procurator, now become a pleader in place of a judge, and bowing the majesty of Rome by suing to a mutinous mob. But the more signs of yielding on his part, the less on their's; and, as might be expected, the record runs, "the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed."

But ere the decision is given, one voice is lifted for Jesus in an unexpected quarter. A message is brought to Pilate from his wife, cautioning him to have "nothing to do with that just man," for she had "suffered many things in a dream because of Him." The warning came in a shape most likely to impress the mind of a Roman, always superstitious about dreams and auguries, and was clothed with the most tender and softening associations of his life. God meant to give Pilate the fullest chance to do justly and win a good report. But his thirst for popularity, his craven fear of insurrection, and his dread of the machinations of these priests to ruin him at Rome, were still more persuasive. And Claudia and her mystic dream will be additional witnesses against him in the final reckoning for this day's work.

DECEMBER 1st, 1886.

Robert College and Bulgaria.

CHRISTOPHER R. ROBERT was a clerk in a leading sugar house in New Orleans. He was esteemed for the courtesy and kindness he exhibited toward all who had business with the firm. These traits so won the heart of a pious sea captain that he was impelled to speak to the young clerk of the interests of his soul and to make him the object of special and importunate prayer. Robert was deeply affected by the captain's words, and not long after was converted. He became wealthy in the course of years, and founded Robert College, near Constantinople, to provide a Christian education for the young men of the various races ruled by the Sultan. The first class to enter contained five Bulgarian boys, and for the last ten years the majority of the students of the senior class has consisted of Bulgarians. What the work of the college has been an enemy has told. The Novoc Vremia, probably the most influential of Russian newspapers, has published the following description of the work of the institution, from its correspondent in Constantinople, who writes:

"Here I made the acquaintance of several prominent Bulgarians grouping around the exarch of Bulgaria, who for a long time has resided in Constantinople. Dr. V. K. Karakanovsky, physician to the Russian Embassy, and A. P. Shopoff, secretary to the exarch, are their recognized leaders. They have explained to me the meaning of the Bulgarian movement.

"'Here in Constantinople,' they told me, 'you will find a key for many important events now developing in Bulgaria. In Russia they see all the evil in the Radicals and Nihilists of Bulgaria. Though these are a great nuisance, yet they can be easily made away with. But in Bulgaria there is another and greater evil which, while growing quietly and almost unobservedly, still surely is sapping the vital forces of the country. Is it not a shame that the Protestant and Catholic missionaries come to our Christian country as to some wild and pagan tribes? Here is the chief trouble, the cause of the internal disintegration, of discontent, of atheism, and of the enmity to Russia. If Russia's foes would multiply among us Catholics with the Polish spirit, then Bulgaria would turn into another and still worse Poland. But we have also Protestants who are far more dangerous than the Catholics; for they are more numerous and more powerful, counting among themselves our most prominent leaders, who, with their English sympathies, have brought unfortunate Bulgaria to the very verge of peril. Here is the way in which England has brought Bulgaria under her claws. Some twenty years ago a rich American citizen, Robert by name, donated £100,000 for the establishment in Constantinople of a Protestant missionary school. Thus appeared Robert College, situated in a princely building on the Bosphorus. According to the will of the founder that college is especially dedicated to the spreading of Protestantism; but the clever English politicians have turned it to their own interests, and so politics now play in the college as important a part as religion. At present in the college there are 147 students, of whom 80 are Bulgarians, and the rest are Greeks and Armenians. During eighteen years that college has given education to about six hundred Bulgarians! All the Bulgarian graduates of the college constitute a kind of Masonic Lodge whose Grand Master is ex-Prince Alexander. Some of the Robert graduates, being Protestants, play very prominent roles in the Bulgarian politics of to-day. For instance, Demitroff, Prefect of Philippopolis, Grekoff, ex-minister, Dr. Vulkovitch, Natchevitch, Stoiloff, who was a right arm of the prince, Gueshoff, the English candidate for the throne of Bulgaria, and many others. Bulgarian boys are turned in Robert College into Protestants and Anglomanians. They try to persuade the people that it was not Russia, but England, who saved them from the Turkish yoke, Russia only having fulfilled England's plan. Stoiloff and Gueshoff (both now ministers) look after the English interests in Bulgaria, and a Panaretoff, professor of Bulgarian language in the college, is an English tool here, in Constantinople. Panaretoff also edits here a Protestant Bulgarian paper, the Zarnitza (The Dawn), which is largely distributed gratis in Bulgaria. Dr. Long, professor in the college, speaks Bulgarian perfectly. For ten years he lived in Bulgaria, preaching Protestantism and serving as agent to Lord Salisbury. Both Long and Panaretoff got decorations from Prince Alexander. When visiting here Alexander did not want to see any Bulgarians but those connected somehow with Robert College. The politicians of Robert College now zealously act in Bulgaria in the English interests, spreading a rumor that Russia aims at the annexation of Bulgaria. In view of the great evil done by Robert College to Bulgaria and her Church, the exarch is about to anathematize those of the parents who will send their children to that college.'"

The Early Huguenots of New York.*

THE Huguenot Society of America has inaugurated its collections by publishing the registers of births, marriages and deaths of the French Church in New York from 1688 to 1804. It is a noble volume in form and print, and its contents, filling nearly five hundred pages, must excite the interest of every descendant of French Protestants in New York and adjacent States. A fine introduction, written clearly and concisely, prefaces the register and is the work of the editor, the Rev. Alfred V. Wittmeyer, the present rector of the Church, which now belongs to the Episcopal communion. Its first name was "Eglise Francoise a la Nouvelle York;" its present corporate title is "The French Church du Saint-Esprit," by which it was received into the Episcopal denomination in 1803.

The early French settlers of Manhattan were in a political sense all Hollanders. The Dutch Republic has a right to claim all the subjects it sheltered from persecution, as the United States holds citizens to-day bearing the names derived from a score of nations. The speech, however, of a large number of the families who came across the sea in 1623 was French, and from the first the Walloons, as they were termed, prized religious services in their own language. The first Holland minister, Domine Michaelius, used both the Dutch and French tongues, and the Rev. Samuel Drisius in 1652 was called as a colleague of Megapolensis in order to keep up the service in French. In 1682 the Rev. Pierre Daille, banished from France to Holland, came to New York after receiving Episcopal ordination in England. He had been invited by the Consistory of the Reformed Duch Church to labor among the Huguenot families which were scattered through all the colonies. Following him in 1687, the Rev. Pierre Peiret organized the Huguenot Church in New York and succeeded in building the first edifice wholly devoted to French services.

The Church from the beginning seems to have been independent of both the Dutch and English bodies. It was simply a French Reformed Church, with its consistory renewed by elections as in the Dutch churches, with regular preaching on the subjects drawn from Calvin's Catechism, and with a special celebration of the four great Christian festivals. Up to 1750 the Church reached its greatest prosperity, having in its membership many of the best citizens of New York and the surrounding country. During the last half of the eighteenth century it steadily declined, owing to dissensions among its members as well as to the great political troubles. In 1804 it determined to enter the Episcopal body, as by doing so it would be able to claim from the corporation of Trinity Church the interest on a thousand pounds left by Elias Desbrosses in 1766. Its present church building is in Twenty-second street.

In looking over the register one is struck by the fact that in baptisms the practice of the godfather and godmother seems always retained. The next fact is the curious spelling of many well-known names. Thus the ancestor of the Duryees appears as "Josse Durien," the modern Jordan is "Jourdain," and so of others. The third point noticeable is the exactness and completeness of the records. The editor has exercised a care for which he is to be thanked by every reader.

After the registers, the Committee on Publications have placed a large number of historical documents relating to the French Protestants, chiefly taken from the archives of the Province of New York. Excellent notes are appended by Edward F. DeLancey, the Chairman of the Committee. A full index to the whole volume ends the work. We congratulate the Society on the happy beginning made and trust other volumes of like excellence may be added from time to time.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

Our Board of Domestic Missions.

THE first half of the fiscal year of the Board closed on November 1st. It is due to the good friends and patrons who so kindly and prayerfully watch over our interests to state as clearly as may be our financial condition and needs, so that those who desire to see the work done can readily comprehend what will be necessary in order to realize their hopes.

On the first of May there was an available balance in this fund of $4,960.73. The income from churches, Sunday-schools, individuals, Ladies' Auxiliary societies and the "Emergency Fund," was $8,238.69; payments to missionaries, expenses and the "Emergency Fund," were $15,043.50; which absorbed the balance at the beginning of the year and left an indebtedness of $1,844.08, which is borrowed. But this surely is no ground for discouragement to a people who are in earnest in the Lord's work, and who do not propose "to play at missions."

The Church Building Fund entered upon the year with a debt of $4,959.60. There have been paid to churches and parsonages $3,801.53 on account of this Fund; and there have been received from churches, Sunday-schools, Ladies' Auxiliary societies and the Woman's Executive Committee, $4,246.04; leaving an indebtedness of $4,515.09. One almost expects to hear the awful question of the prophet, "Is it time for you, O ye, to dwell in your ceiled houses, and this house lie waste?" Especially is this true in reference to an accumulating list of applications now actually before your Board awaiting the time when the Church shall please to put us in the way of answering the requests.

The record reads thus—and all applications for aid from the Church Building Fund or pastoral support must come with the conscientious recommendation of a Classis: Belmond, Iowa, $400; Pattersonville, Iowa, $1,000; Charles Mix Co., Dakota, two, each $700, $1.400; Grand View, Dakota, one, $500; Hope Church, Emmons Co., Dakota, $1,000; Wakonda, Dakota, $900; Pella, Nebraska, some aid in building; Philadelphia, Kansas, $1,500; First Holland, Mich., $3,000; Second Kalamazoo, Mich., $8,000; and others entirely unsheltered have timidly asked us whether there was any possibility for us to give them the slightest encouragement. What shall be the reply? It requires but slight skill in computation to discover that the $20,000 so earnestly recommended by the Synod will just about answer the question, and we can make glad hearts and fill a half score of sanctuaries with the praises of God. Shall we have the means to do so?

COR. SEC.

....THE HUDSON RIVER MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION met on Monday, Nov. 29th, in the Reformed Church of Rhinebeck. The exercises were of peculiar interest and importance. The exegesis by Rev. W. Veenschoten was on "Christ's Prayer for the Church's Unity," John 17: 21, and, emphasizing the expression "that the world may believe that thou didst send me," maintained that the "oneness" prayed for is outward and visible, and not merely spiritual. In way of application, the exegete submitted a plan of union which he argued would be just and feasible as among "Reformed Churches of the Presbyterian Order," and as there must be a beginning somewhere he advocated the abrogation of the almost invisible line that separates our Church and the Presbyterian. The discussion showed that the differences of opinion were not so much upon the main question of ultimate organic union, as upon the details of it, and the timeliness of its agitation.

The sermon by Rev. C. H. Polhemus was from Gal. 2: 20, "I am crucified with Christ," and was a sermon of great practical power.

The essay by Rev. E. A. Collier, D.D., on "Christian Hymnology," was an admirable sketch of the history of hymns and hymn-writers, from the early centuries of the Christian Church to the present, and embodied much information on this subject, in respect to which Dr. Collier is so competent to speak.

The brethren were welcomed most hospitably by Brother Campbell and his people, and a pleasant feature of the occasion was the supper, provided and served by the ladies in the lecture-room.

The following minute prepared by a committee, of which Rev. Dr. Van Santvoord was chairman, is an appropriate expression of the Association's sense of loss in the death of Rev. Dr. John Forsyth:

"Since the last meeting of the Association one of its most venerated and beloved members, the Rev. John Forsyth, D.D., has been called to his heavenly rest. His late associates who have so often taken sweet counsel with him, grieve that we shall no more see amongst us him whose genial presence was wont to enliven these gatherings. We recognize, nevertheless, the wisdom of Him who orders the way and has appointed the bounds of every one of His children, and bow before this dispensation of His, not because we must, but because we know and feel that what the Judge of all the earth does is kind as well as right. We find it a fitting and pleasant duty to recognize the marked relations which our departed brother sustained to this Association, and the valuable aid he all along rendered it, and to place on record the sentiments of respect and affection with which his strong qualities of mind and his beautiful Christian character inspired all his associates.

"He was one of the founders of this Association and was made its first President twenty-two years ago, and through the years following has been a faithful attendant on its meetings,—reading before it at various times papers on topics of interest marked by scholarly breadth and research, by clear views of Scripture truth and by a devout and reverent spirit. He took a lively and vigorous part in the discussions of the body, was ever ready with wise counsels, modestly expressed, and with helpful services whenever called for in the promotion of such Christian objects as the Society sought to attain. His genial nature, frank and cordial manners, broad sympathies and loving Christian spirit, endeared him to the brethren, presenting in what he did and what he was a character which the sacred writer's words not unfittingly describe, 'In all things showing thyself a pattern of good works.' Such 'works do follow him' now, being a memorial not only of what God hath wrought, but a persuasive, spoken with Divine emphasis to surviving wayfarers, 'that ye be not slothful but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.'"

The next meeting will be in the Reformed Church of Hudson, on the fourth Monday in January.

....COHOES, N. Y.—The large auditorium of this church was filled to overflowing Sunday, Nov. 14th, the occasion being the celebration of the anniversary of the Young People's Association of the church. The singing was a most enjoyable feature, and the lecture of Mr. D. J. De Camp, of Schenectady, was one of the most stirring and impressive addresses ever heard in the church. The secretary read his annual report, which related that the Association was organized in October, 1879, with a membership of six, and since then 191 names have been enrolled. Owing to deaths and removals there are now 163 members, 27 of whom have become members since the last report. Ninety-five of these are members of the church. Ten of those who have united with the church during the past year were members of the Association. Meetings have been held in the lecture-room every Sunday evening except anniversary nights, and during the past year the attendance has been unusually large and the interest great. Seven cottage prayer-meetings have been held during the year. In addition to the Sunday evening meeting regular business meetings are held on the first Tuesday, and literary meetings the third Tuesday of each month. The expenses of the year have been $41.20.

....SIXTH AVENUE CHURCH, N. Y.—Faith Mission Band, a company of over ninety little girls and boys, celebrated their ninth anniversary on Friday evening, Dec. 3d. The church edifice was packed, so that many persons were compelled to stand throughout the two hours' service. A very delightful entertainment was given in the form of songs, recitations and dialogues. These all presented the idea of missions to the mind and heart of the audience, who went away expressing themselves as highly pleased. The substantial collection which they gave of money amply proved it.

....CLEVELAND, O.—The installation of Rev. Geo. Niemeyer as pastor of the Reformed Church of Cleveland, O., took place on Sunday, Nov. 28th. The services were conducted by Rev. D. Broek, of Holland, Mich., who preached the sermon from 2 Tim. 4: 2, and performed the installation service according to the usual form of our Church. In the afternoon Rev. Niemeyer preached his inaugural sermon from Acts 10: 29. In the evening Rev. D. Broek preached in the chapel on the west side of the city. All the services were very interesting, and the people feel greatly encouraged with the coming of their new pastor.

Brother Niemeyer left an interesting charge at Vriesland, Mich., where he had labored very successfully for the past two years, and where the people very reluctantly consented to his departure; but he felt it his duty to obey the call from Cleveland, considering especially the isolated condition of the church.

The new pastor intends to introduce English preaching, which is felt to be an absolute necessity in order to retain the young people, especially in a large city where so many strong and influential American churches are found; in this way there is a prospect that the Reformed Church in Cleveland will become strong and permanently established.

The church possesses a very commodious church edifice, nearly free from debt, but the special need at present is a parsonage; this the people feel unable to procure without outside help. If the ladies of our Church, who have already assisted a number of churches in procuring parsonages, could render them some assistance for this purpose, it would be money invested for a worthy object. We believe that the outlook for the Reformed Church of Cleveland, with her new pastor, is at present brighter than ever before.

....At the meeting of THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION, Monday, Dec. 6th, the Rev. M. G. Hansen was elected President and the Rev. Wm. H. Ford, Secretary. An interesting and carefully written paper was read by the Rev. A. H. Demarest, upon "Future Probation." The paper next Monday will be by the Rev. T. W. Chambers, D.D.; subject, "Classification of Parables." The Committee on Topics would be glad to receive subjects for discussion.

....BRIGHTON HEIGHTS, STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.—The pastor, Rev. W. W. Clark, in his Thanksgiving sermon, alluding to religious blessings, said in reference to his own church: The contributions have exceeded those of previous years, $2,000 having been given for benevolent purposes and $5,500 for the current expenses and needed repairs of the church. More pews are now rented than ever before. Since last Thanksgiving 36 persons have made a public confession of their faith in Christ and 11 have been received by letter from other churches. Both church and chapel have been painted in becoming colors, a large portico has been added with beautiful windows, a neat iron fence has been put around the property, the grounds have been graded and sodded, and the sidewalk relaid on the three adjoining streets. The organ has been repaired and improved. Altogether the improvements have been very marked.

Several neighborhood Bible Circles are being established, at which the pastor will give instructions in Home Bible study, thus inciting a greater interest in the Scriptures and at the same time bringing together the people for social intercourse. The ladies in the church are more interested in Christian work, and all look for marked results during the coming winter.

We learn that Mr. Clark recently visited New Brunswick, giving Bible lessons to the college students. He is spending the present week at New Haven, giving two or three lectures a day to the students at Yale. There is a deep interest in Bible study among the Christian men at Yale, and there is reason to hope that these special services will be greatly blessed.

....THE CLASSIS OF SCHENECTADY met in adjourned session on Thursday, Dec. 2d, in the Church of Lisha's Kill and ordained Mr. E. J. Blekkink to the Gospel ministry, installing him also as pastor of that church. The sermon was preached by Rev. J. A. DeBaun, D.D., from Matt. 13: 16. It was a forceful and striking presentation of the blessedness of having the Gospel, and of hearing it from the lips of God's chosen ambassadors. The liturgical form was read by the Rev. C. P. Ditmars, and the brother was set apart by the laying on of hands by all the ministers present. The charge to the pastor was then given by Rev. N. F. Nickerson, and the charge to the people by Rev. H. M. Voorhees.

....PUBLICATIONS.—A sermon entitled "Where to Throw Your Salt; or, Healing the Springs," on the text 2 Kings 2: 21, "And he went forth unto the spring of the waters and cast the salt in there," preached by Rev. Thomas C. Easton, D.D., before the Essex County Bible Society in the North Reformed Church, Newark, has been published in pamphlet form. It treats in an energetic and able manner of religion in the spring-heads of life—private, social, civil and educational—and is well worth being printed and widely circulated....A sermon "On Slander," recently preached by the Rev. W. R. Gordon, D.D., in the Reformed Church of Manhasset, L. I., on Ps. 11: 1-3, has been published in neat pamphlet form by request of members of the consistory and congregation of that church. Much truth on the subject is well and strikingly put, which, if seriously pondered, will have a good influence.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Rev. J. W. Dunnewold, of Gibbsville, Wis., declines the call to Lansing, Ill....Rev. H. E. Nies, of Paterson, N. J., has also declined the call to Grand Haven, Mich....Rev. William I. Chamberlain, son of Rev. Dr, Chamberlain, of India, spoke a week ago last Sabbath in the Fifth Church at Grand Rapids, and in the evening in the Third Church (Rev. Mr. Kriekard's). At both meetings large audiences were present. During the past week Rev. Mr. Chamberlain has visited several Holland churches at the West in the interest of foreign missions....The Church of Campbell County, Dakota, has built a church of sods, 18 by 20 feet inside measure and 8 feet high. The roof is also made of sods, which are laid on limbs of trees. Each side has three windows, and a door is at one end The walls inside are plastered with a plaster made of clay, sand, and flax-straw, a plaster with which the Russians of Dakota plaster their houses and stables inside and outside. The pews are made of rough boards laid on blocks of wood. The pulpit is made of a 100-pound coffee box, which serves as a platform, and a few rough boards in the shape of a desk. There is no floor in this church, except as the virgin soil serves as such. On this church there is still a small debt for windows and the door. A stove is very much needed, to make it somewhat comfortable in the winter, when the mercury often gets down to 40 degrees below zero. A few boards for a floor would also be a very desirable addition. Let a few friends get together and make up a purse for this poor people on the very frontier, so that they can pay for their six windows and one door, and have a stove and a floor in their sod church. This church, I believe, is the only one in Campbell County, and I think that the Reformed Church is the only organization in the county.

....OUR FOREIGN MISSIONS.—The Board received into its treasury in November $4,818.67. This is $1,131 more than in the corresponding month of 1885. It makes the total amount received in seven months $22,349.12, and shows, for the whole period, a gain of $777 upon last year. The fact of gain, however small, is encouraging. But it needs still to be remembered that, as yet, only about one-fourth of the probable expenditure of the year has been contributed; that $73,000 are still needed to make up THE HUNDRED THOUSAND, and that only five months remain in which to do the work of the year. The time is short. Yet it will be long enough if the brethren will earnestly, heartily and prayerfully push the work.

COR. SEC.

....THANKSGIVING SERVICES were pretty generally held in the Reformed churches, and appropriate sermons preached, judging from the interesting and liberal abstracts of them published in our exchanges. We have not space to specify.

....CALL ACCEPTED.—The Rev. G. J. Van Neste, of Kiskatom, N. Y., has accepted a unanimous call from the Church of Flatbush, Ulster Co., N. Y. He expects to preach his farewell sermon at Kiskatom next Sunday, and to begin his labors in his new field the Sunday following.

....KINGSTON, N. Y.—On Thanksgiving day the Rev. J. G. Van Slyke, D.D., in his discourse, made the statement that it closed a decade of service as pastor of the First Reformed Church. During this time he has never been kept out of his pulpit by illness. Under his ministry, the church property has been renovated and enlarged, and 232 persons have been added to the membership of the church. The resident membership of the church is now 511. During the decade, he has buried 170 members of his congregation, 83 of whom were members of the church.

....PERSONAL.—We regret to know that the Rev. Dr. E. B. Coe has been laid aside for some weeks by an attack of gastic fever. He is, however, recovering, and it is hoped that by the end of the month he will be able to resume his labors in the Forty-eighth Street Church. He has been recuperating at Lakewood, N. J.

....MR. CHARLES H. AMERMAN, who died at Passaic, N. J., on Sunday, was the father of the Rev. Dr. James L. Amerman, of Tokio, Japan. He was a gentleman of sterling Christian character, quiet and unostentatious but constantly useful, conscientious in the support of Christian work, and deeply interested in the missions of the Church.

John Perdue Gray, M.D., LL.D.

DR. GRAY died of Bright's disease, at Utica, N. Y., on November 29th. In 1882 an attempt was made upon his life by a lunatic, Henry Remshaw, who shot him in the face, from which wound he never fully recovered. He was born August 6th, 1825, in Halfmoon, Centre County, Pa., was educated in the common schools, at Bellefonte Academy and in Dickinson College, in his native State, and in the last-named institution received the degree of A. B. He was graduated in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania in 1848 and became resident physician of the Philadelphia Hospital.

In 1851 he was appointed third assistant physician to Superintendent Amaziah Brigham, of the State asylum in Utica, second assistant in 1852, first assistant and acting superintendent in 1853, retaining that position until his death. He was appointed medical superintendent of the Michigan State Asylum when it was projected, and originated plans for the new institution in Kalamazoo. In 1854 he succeeded Dr. T. R. Beck as editor of the American Journal of Insanity, published in Utica, N. Y.

Dr. Gray was president of the psychological section of the International Medical Congress in Philadelphia, in 1870, and read a paper on mental hygiene on that occasion. He was appointed by the Governor as a commissioner for establishing the Willard Asylum at Ovid and the State Asylum at Buffalo. Hamilton College conferred the degree of LL.D. upon him, and Dickinson College added that of A.M. He was at one time president of the Medical Society of the State of New York. He was an honorary member of the British Psychological Association, of the Freniatrical Society of Italy the Psychological Society of Paris, and the American Archæological Society. He was Professor of Psychological Medicine and Jurisprudence in Bellevue Hospital Medical College and of the Albany Medical College. He has rendered conspicuous service to the State and general government as an expert in celebrated criminal cases. The last one of importance was that of Guiteau, who killed President Garfield. He has read papers on various phases of insanity before almost every prominent medical organization in the country. In fact, Dr. Gray has achieved an inestimable work in his great efforts to ameliorate the condition of the insane in this country, to improve the modes of treatment, and to facilitate the care of patients that were not incurable. A leader in thought as well as in practice, he has helped to broaden, almost to create, a science and a literature relative to insanity, and to write his name in enduring characters on the history of our public charities.

Dr. Gray was a man of sterling worth of character. He had no mean elements in his nature; his was a liberal soul, and magnanimity underlay all his theories and policy. He was intent on the maintenance of his own institution and of all the public charities on a generous scale. He took large views of public administration, and allowed no personal, selfish consideration to tinge them in any degree. Conscious of his own integrity, firm in the wisdom of his management, engrossed with the truth of his theories of insanity, which determined his whole policy, he met criticism with courtesy and with courage, and stood as the sturdy champion of the patients and of the humanity which cared for them.

Dr. Gray was for many years, and until his death, a communicant in the Reformed Church of Utica, N. Y., holding firmly the Christian faith, and exemplifying and commending it in his life.

The General Outlook.

....There are 23 Welsh Congregational churches in New York, and 54 in Pennsylvania, where the preaching is mostly or entirely in the Welsh language.

....The anti-music convention of United Presbyterians, in session in Pittsburgh, adopted a plan of organization for those opposed to instrumental music in churches. The new organization will be known as the United Presbyterian Association of North America.

....Dr. Galusha Anderson has accepted the presidency of Denison University, Ohio (Baptist). The university has an endowment of $310,000.

....The Rev. George Scholl, D.D., has been appointed General Secretary of Foreign Missions of the Lutheran General Synod.

....Two hundred ministers of Glasgow, Scotland, of different denominations, have united in an effort to reach the non-church-going classes.

....The Pope is reported to have said lately: "I have the greatest opinion of England. I feel grateful to her, and have the greatest respect for her laws and constitution; for I see she is just, and, therefore, liberal. She is strong, and all the Catholics under her rule have greater liberty and freedom than they have in any other part of the world."

....Sir Richard Wallace has given £10,000 towards building a church for Englishmen in Paris.

....Emperor William contributes 50,000 marks to the fund for the erection of a Luther monument in Berlin.

....The elders of the Northwestern Independent Church of Philadelphia have resigned in a body because the pastor, Rev. Waldo Messaros, continues to occupy the pulpit while the accusations brought against him are still unsettled.

....It is reported that Mr. Moody has received from Mr. D. M. Weston, of the Shawmut Church, Boston, a donation of $50,000, to be applied to his educational work at Northfield and Mt. Hermon, Mass. With this gift another dormitory is to be built.

....The famous sermon that John Knox preached in Edinburgh in 1565, "for the which he was inhibited preaching for a season," was sold not long since for $2,075.

....The position of first assistant to Dr. Dix in Trinity Church, this city, has been accepted by Rev. Henry A. Adams, Canon of All Saints' Cathedral, Albany.

....The report that Mr. George Müller died in Australia in May last is finally contradicted by the fact that he appeared in Brisbane in the last week in July and conducted meetings there, The Australian Christian World of July 30th says that "he came to Brisbane unexpectedly, and was speaking in the churches."

....Lord Lawrence says: "Christianity, wherever it has gone, and nowhere more so than in India, has promoted the dignity of woman, the sanctity of marriage, and the brotherhood of man. Where it has not actually converted, it has checked and controlled; where it has not renewed, it has refined; and where it has not sanctified, it has softened and subdued."

....Five Lutheran pastors in the Baltic provinces are daily expecting their deposition from office on account of disobedience, i. e., faithfulness in their pastoral work. The perversion of Lutherans to the Greek faith is decreasing perceptibly and the pastors have to suffer for it. The city of Reval has six Lutheran churches, which own considerable property in investments. The government has taken that out of the trustees' hands and three of the churches have to close their doors.—The Lutheran.

"Jesus Wept."

BY THE REV. NORMAN PLASS.

Jesus wept!
Pity for human grief,
For pangs of sorrow brief,
For woe without relief,
His bosom swept.
He would not have His loved ones free from these;
But He is touched by their infirmities.

Jesus wept!
Feelings of sympathy
For men of low degree—
Creatures of poverty—
Over Him crept.
He would not have men idly wait for food,
But has compassion on the multitude.

Jesus wept!
Thought of the sufferings
That sin as wages brings,
Awaked in His heart-strings
Echoes that slept.
Not for His own afflictions is He moved,
But for the pain of those He dearly loved.

Jesus wept!
For sinful men He mourns,
Whose hate His brow adorns
With crown of cruel thorns,
Their wrath unkept.
He cares not that rejection is His part,
But that such sins possess the human heart.

A Window Garden.

BY O. A. BIERSTADT.

JEANNETTE FLEURY was ten years old and not very large for her age. She lived in Paris on the Rue St. Antoine, in the heart of that poor and populous quarter known as the Faubourg St. Antoine. With her father and her grandmother, she occupied a very few rooms of a very large house, which was tenanted also by a host of other poor families. Little Jeannette's pale face was pleasant rather than pretty; she used to comb her black hair straight back from her forehead and let it dangle in a long braid behind; she did not own a hat, and always went bareheaded, in and out of doors; and as for her shabby black frock, no American girl with any self-respect would be seen in such a dress.

Jeannette could only just remember when her mother died. At the time she was so young that it seemed all a great mystery to her, as indeed death is to many older and wiser people than this little French girl. She could not understand why papa and grandma looked so solemn and cried so much. And the funeral was more like an excursion to her than anything to be sad about, for she walked with her relatives and friends behind the hearse to a distant cemetery, almost out into the country, and was much amused to see all the men on the sidewalks take off their hats, in accordance with the beautiful French custom, as the procession passed. For a long time after this eventful day her father was very kind to her. He took her, upon one memorable occasion, to the square where flowers are sold, and there she picked out two little earthen pots, one containing mignonette, the other a geranium. The girl carried these precious possessions home in her own arms, deposited them in a window five stories above the street, and ever afterwards cared for them most tenderly.

As Jeannette grew older her window garden became more and more of a comfort to her. She was in sad need of some consolation, for a great deal of the peace and happiness departed gradually out of her life. Her blue-bloused father seemed little by little to lose all love of the manual labor which had hitherto been the pride and support of his existence, and he acquired the habit of spending far too many hours in the cabaret on the nearest corner, drinking and playing cards with a set of idle fellows. Then he was apt to be very cross on coming home, and Jeannette and her grandmother soon got to be afraid of him. The grandmother was almost too aged to attend to the housekeeping, and her weakness increased with her years. When at a loss for anything better to say, she would sometimes set her white cap aright over her gray hair, smooth out her large blue apron, and then bring forth from the depths of her venerable intellect some recollection or comparison that began much more appropriately than it ended.

It was not long after Jeannette's tenth birthday that she and her grandmother were awaiting anxiously the father's return one winter evening. He was later even than usual. To pass away the time the girl bent over the two pots of flowers, which were placed on the broad sill just inside the window, and inhaled their delicate perfume.

"Isn't it so, grandma," asked Jeannette with the least little bit of a childish lisp in her French, "that you, too, love my window garden?"

"Yes, yes, child, you have reason," answered the grandmother. "I like to see you smell of the flowers. That recalls me my youth. At that epoch St. Antoine hadn't many prettier girls than I, though now Lisbeth Fleury has lost all the air of it. And how many friends I had! One young girl of the convent, I remember, who loved flowers well. She smelled of so many once that they poisoned her and made her face swell up like—"

"O, grandma," interrupted Jeannette, "it's not my flowers that will be so wicked. I love them too much. But what has become of papa?"

"I know nothing of him," responded the aged woman, "but one can divine where he holds himself at this instant."

"Where, think you?" questioned Jeannette.

"He must be down there at the corner of the street," said the grandmother, "and I have fear lest he become a bad subject. The other day I spoke with the lady of the counter in the cabaret. You know her, child, she that never stops her crocheting without end, except to take in silver, and her eyes are everywhere all at one moment."

"But what did she say, grandma?" asked Jeannette.

"Ah, well!" sighed the old woman, "it's she that told me that my Jacques, your papa, loves his little glass too well."

"What can one do to change him?" inquired the girl.

"It is necessary to speak to him," replied the grandmother. "How the men are droll! I remind myself of an old mother who had a worth-nothing of a son. She talked to him well, and he troubled her never any more, for that same night he was assassinated in a fight and brought to the house dead on a shutter."

"Don't let's breathe a word to papa, then," said Jeannette.

The girl and her grandmother sat in silence for some time longer. They looked at the shadows on the wall, flickering in unison with the flame of their solitary candle, and they listened intently to the noises of the great city and the great tenement-house in which they lived. Through the closed casement came the rumble of passing vans and carriages, the shrill voices of women, the hoarse laughter of men, and once a strain of the Marseillaise mounted on the air, for the Faubourg St. Antoine is still as fiercely republican and revolutionary as it was almost a hundred years ago, when its teeming population rose in arms and marched upon the grim old Bastile. Now and then the tread of some home-bound tenant could be heard upon the interminable stairs, either stopping at a lower story or climbing to a greater height. At last an unsteady and shuffling step made Jeannette jump from her chair and hasten to open the door.

"It's papa," she exclaimed. "I'm so glad to see you, papa. I thought you were never coming."

"What's the matter?" said the man, as he staggered into the room and dropped his cap on the floor and himself upon the nearest seat. His flushed face and wild eyes showed only too plainly that he had been drinking.

"Ah, my Jacques!" spoke up the aged woman, "I'll tell you what's the matter. It is that you love neither your daughter nor your old mother any more. You're going to lose yourself, if you regard so often the bottom of the little glass. You bring to my memory that wicked neighbor of ours, who worked not but to swallow one dram after another, until—until he inherited a fortune."

"Yes, yes, it's that. It's a fortune I want," rejoined the man. "I must have all the silver in the house. Give it me on the spot. Do you hear?"

"But, dear papa, we haven't a sou," said Jeannette.

"A pest on you" exclaimed the worthless father. "You haven't a sou, and yet you dispense silver for a fire like that," pointing to the very small stove. "How hot this room is! I'll let in some air, for I suffocate."

He stumbled across the room to the window, which opened inwards in two halves like most French windows, and pushed the poor little window garden out of his way. The pot of mignonette fell to the floor and was broken into a hundred pieces, but Jeannette was quick enough to save her beloved geranium. She caught it up to her bosom, surveyed the damage that had been done, and burst out into a loud cry, in which her grandmother also joined, making between them quite a noise.

"Silence!" roared the man in a great rage. "Ah, this is too strong—such a bagatelle to make such a howl! Decidedly, I'm ennuie with this sort of life, with a stupid, scolding old woman and a do-nothing, crying girl always hanging on. I'll quit them. I've thought of it a thousand times, now I'll do it. Listen, you two! I'm going to save myself, to leave you planted here. Do you understand? You'll have to take care of yourselves, for I'm off and you will never see me again, never. Adieu!" and thereupon, without waiting a moment to hearken to any prayers or promises, he slammed the door after him and was gone.

This sudden desertion, as unexpected as a clap of thunder out of a clear sky, was a terrible blow to Jeannette Fleury and her grandmother. At first they could not realize that there was any more truth in it than in a dream. They sat up all night, hoping to hear a certain shuffling tread climb up the stairs once more, but it did not come that night, nor for many a long day and night afterwards. Hard times followed. The grandmother complained very much, that at her time of life she must suffer from poverty worse than any she had ever known before, and perhaps she would have given up in despair if it had not been for Jeannette. This little girl developed an unlimited amount of spirit and courage, and showed herself a true heroine, for all the heroism of the world is not displayed upon its historic battle-fields. If we could spy into the future and see all the trials before us, we might well be appalled, and wise men would shut their eyes rather than exercise such a power. One soldier cannot stand up against a regiment, though he might vanquish every man in it taken singly. And while it would be impossible to fight through a sea of troubles all at once, its waves may be overcome one by one. So Jeannette did not waste any time thinking how many hardships were in store for her; she simply did the duty of the hour and let the future look out for itself.

As the grandmother and granddaughter had no money when their provisions were eaten up, Jeannette went to the nearest Bureau de bienfaisance to ask and receive public charity. More than once, also, she visited unwillingly enough the Mont-de-Piete, as the great governmental pawnbroker's shop is called, and left a good many things there in exchange for a very little money. When rent day came the two unfortunates left their old quarters and moved into a small attic room, way up under the mansard roof of the same large house, with a single window looking down upon a dreary court-yard. Luckily Jeannette knew how to sew very well, and it was not difficult for her to get all the work to carry home that she could possibly do. Her scanty pay and the trifling sums earned by her grandmother's ceaseless knitting kept them alive, for the poorer people of France have the happiest faculty of living upon surprisingly little and seasoning it with as cheerful faces as if they owned the whole world.

For five long years and more after her father's desertion, little Jeannette worked hard and lived humbly with her aged grandmother. The girl was the real head of the family and a great success in that capacity. She carried the sewing and knitting to and from their patrons, did all of the marketing and most of the cooking—often a paper bag of fried potato chips from a shop close by was all they had for a whole meal, and on their rare holidays she took her grandmother down to the river to look over the stone parapets at the boats, or to the Tuilleries Gardens to listen to the band and gaze at the fountains. Cheerful as they usually were, Jeannette sometimes found it hard to keep her grandmother from sinking into melancholy.

One bright summer morning the girl sat sewing by the open window, while the old woman was knitting industriously in the middle of the room, stopping now and then to count her stitches.

"Say, there, little daughter," spoke up the grandmother, "how is it that you are so gay? You're always smiling like the carved spouts on Notre Dame."

"I hope, grandma, I haven't quite such an ugly smile," said Jeannette, as she called to mind the grotesque grins of the fabulous monsters, into which the mediæval architects chiseled the gargayles of the famous old cathedral.

"That makes nothing," remarked the grandmother. "But, it's soon almost a century since my Jacques took his heels to his neck, and I, here am I still at despair, while there you are as happy as—as a snail about to be eaten. How does that arrive?"

"Ah, well! I try to think no more of our misfortune," answered Jeannette. "I am content to love my grandma and my window garden. Regard it, I pray you, grandma. Smell my new mignonette and see how high my old geranium is; so high and so thick that nobody on the other side of the court could see me behind it."

"I love not to regard your window garden," rejoined the old woman. "It has the air to me of being the cause of all our trouble. Without that it is well possible that my Jacques would never have quitted us. Ah, how he has been away for a long time! Perhaps he will return one day in the future. I shall expect him, like that mother whose son came home—to find her in the sepulchre."

"But, I'm sure, grandma," said Jeannette, "that papa will come to us while we are alive and well."

"You know longer than I, then," responded the grandmother. "But sew away, my little daughter, and you'll have some silver for him. You recall to me of a young woman who was on the point of marrying. She sewed so laboriously that she made herself blind, and lost her husband over the bargain."

"Grandma, grandma, why do you talk like that?" asked the girl.

"Because, child, I can do nothing but think of your papa," replied the aged woman, and she burst out crying.

Jeannette dropped her work, went close up to her grandmother, put both arms around her, kissed her again and again, and tried to console her with every sort of endearment. It was hard for the little girl to keep her own tears back, but she succeeded in doing so and in saying between some almost choking pauses:

"Don't—don't cry, grandma,—courage, and all will go well. Papa will come home. Don't we always leave the door open for him. He will come—and be different from the old times. Trust in God, grandma! Let us—work and wait—in hope. Oh! I know papa will come. Perhaps—perhaps, that's his step on the stairs now. Grandma, is it—can it be papa?"

Something like an hour before Jeannette Fleury uttered this broken speech a man rose from his bed in an upper story of the swarming house on the opposite side of the court. He had slept in his clothes, and his rumpled blouse, matted hair and bloodshot eyes told a tale of dissipation. Most of the preceding night he had passed in one of St. Antoine's numerous wine-shops to celebrate his return to Paris from five years of profitless wandering in the provinces, and in helpless stupor he had been dragged off at last to a friend's lodging to sleep himself sober. When he awoke his friend had gone to work, and the man could think of nothing better than to put his head out of the window and see where he was. Pure air proved a healthful beverage to him, and cleared his wits wonderfully. His roaming eyes lighted at length upon the little window garden of the attic story across the court, and a host of recollections of times past and gone surged through his mind. This man was Jacques Fleury. The sight of the flowers, the mignonette and the geranium, which he still remembered as his child's favorites, made him think of her, and thinking of her made him long to see her. Then he began asking himself if this window garden could be hers, and soon he determined to ascertain the truth. He had imagined that his aged mother and his young daughter would long since have been driven away by poverty, so it surprised him not a little when his search for the owner of the window garden led him into the same old house he had once occupied years before. As he climbed its uppermost pair of stairs, he looked in at an open door and saw his little Jeannette—older and more beautiful now from the refining influence of her honest heroism, clasping her grandmother in a close embrace, as she asked, "Can it be papa?"

Jeannette was right. Her lost father did come home, and her tender love reformed him in time and made of him a new and better man.

Seventy-five Years Ago in New York.

AFTER the late venerable Captain Bicker's interesting reminiscences of the olden time in this city we could scarcely expect to hear again from that far-off period by the pen of any yet among the living. But it is my privilege to have in my hand a communication received some time since from another aged gentlemen, now near his ninety-second year, recording some passages of his early life in New York well worthy of preservation. It is from the still active pen of Mr. Henry Hill, a former Boston merchant, and now residing in its vicinity, who was a clerk in this city during his youth.

I quote as follows from his letter: "In 1809, and when nearly fifteen, I began to reside in the city of New York, and as a clerk of Hill & Smith, 100 Wall street. I was to keep their books and to assist in selling groceries and ship-stores. The store fronted on Coffee-house slip, which extended nearly or quite to Front street, and was full of vessels. Noah Talcott and Green & Lovett were in business near by. I boarded at Mrs. June's, 77 John street, and at that time all the buildings in that street were dwelling-houses.

"In 1811 our store was no longer in Wall street, but at 106 Front street, where consignments were received from the South, and one of the correspondents was Asa Otis, a young commission merchant in Richmond, Va. He was from Connecticut, and died at his residence in that State a few years ago, leaving to the American Board of Foreign Missions nearly a million of dollars. His uncle, Joseph Otis, was one of the old New York merchants."

Mr. Hill was a member of the old Cedar Street Church, of which the Rev. John Brodhead Romeyn was the pastor, and Divie Bethune and Elisha Coit were prominent elders. He began to attend there in 1810, and in 1812 became a member by a public profession of Christ. For some time previously, as he states, he "attended worship in the Middle Dutch Church, and of the preachers there heard Drs. Livingston, Kuypers and Brodhead. Among the distinguished men in that denomination were John Nitchie and John D. Keese. At the Cedar Street Church of that day, now the Fifth avenue, of which Dr. John Hall is the pastor, attended Oliver Walcott, Archibald Gracie, Benjamin Strong, Ebenezer Stevens, Amasa Jackson, William Codman, Anthony Dey, and the Griswolds and Howlands.

"Thinking that a knowledge of the French language might be an accomplishment and might also be useful, and having some leisure evenings, I began to attend the academy of Monsieur Agnel, near the Park. He was a little, old, bent-up, snuff-taking Frenchman, always wearing a wrapper and night-cap; and he was a superior instructor. Among the scholars who became merchants were Phelps, Greenleaf, and Samuel Howland."

It is a very pleasing circumstance here to add that the nonagenarian writer of the above was a member of a small praying circle of young mem connected with the Cedar Street Church, of which the Rev. Dr. Vermilye, senior pastor of the Reformed church in this city, was the youngest, and that these now venerable disciples have recently renewed that early friendship and fellowship after so long an interval by an exchange of letters and fraternal salutations.

When first addressed by Mr. Hill, the Rev. Doctor could scarcely believe that he was the same person of that name whom he had known in that young men's Cedar street prayer-meeting so long since, having supposed that he had died several years ago. But he remembered him, and to a friend spoke of him as "very courteous, gentlemanly, and attractive in his manners," and that he "had engraved a very pleasing record on his memory as a beautiful character," adding, "How strange that after so many years we should be brought into recognition!" Certainly, the friends of both of these venerable gentlemen will congratulate them on so delightful a providential renewal of early church acquaintance in this "eventide" of their lives. W. H.

Systematic Benevolence.

AT the sessions of the Missionary Conference recently held in Brooklyn, reference was made to the fact that during a certain period of the year our Foreign Board was subjected to a loss by being compelled to borrow funds to meet actual expenses for those months. All deplored the fact, some resolved to try summer collections, but no plan was agreed upon. The solution is difficult.

We were urged, both ministers and laymen, to carry home with us the spirit of the meetings, and so "enthuse" those who were denied the privilege which we had enjoyed, with the hope that the Church would be aroused to increased liberality and faithfulness.

Perhaps a layman who was present and did not take part in the discussions, but who was, nevertheless, "enthused" by hearing some of the able papers read, by the encouraging statement from Japan, by the "electric" tongue, soon, we trust, to be heard in India, and by the Holy Spirit, whose power was invoked at the beginning, may be able to help others, as he has been helped, by a plan suggested many, many years ago by one of our then prominent and liberal contributors to Christ's cause.

Plan.

At the beginning of each year lay before you the list of the benevolent operations of the Church, and such other causes to which you know you will be asked to contribute, arranged in the order of their requirements, with the date opposite when the collections are made in your church, or when you will probably be asked to contribute. Estimate your income for the year, taking the average of the five preceding years, if you have no better way, settle in your mind what percentage of this belongs to the Lord's cause, according to the injunction "Let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him," put the amount thus arrived at prominently at the head of your paper. Then and there give it to the Lord, and ask for wisdom to guide you in the apportionment, remembering all causes are not alike needy.

At the close of the year, should you find your income larger than estimated, there would be no difficulty in using the surplus, and this surplus you are bound to use, for you pledged the percentage at the beginning. But suppose the income is less than estimated, then see if you have been impoverished because of your gifts; if you have, then the Lord would, no doubt, accept a less percentage the following year, but if you were in affluent circumstances it would not hurt you, and I think it fair to conclude that you had not come up to the full measure of your privileges and duty, and so a divine power had helped you.

If any should adopt this plan, I think they would find it a pleasure and a privilege to give when called on, and there would be no cry of too many collections. Another advantage is, that you are always ready in time, and if you are absent when the collection is taken up the treasury does not suffer, for you will, of course, send the amount to its proper place; then, too, you never give from impulse, but from your "conscience fund."

Systematic benevolence, it seems to me, is the "cure all" for depleted or empty treasuries, and I verily believe that if the Church, as a whole, should adopt this or some other systematic plan, there would be no complaint, and God's blessing in rich measure would descend on His now unwilling Church.

Should any one try this or a similar plan, it might be well to observe the result one year from now.

General Items.

....Of the Congregational church at Hampton, Conn., organized in 1723, of which Rev. Daniel Denison, a native of the town, is pastor, it is said that "a delightful revival has been quietly going on (in it) for more than a year, and the house of worship, newly repaired, is thronged with interested worshippers."

....The smallest Methodist Conference is that of France, which only has twenty-five ministers and four or five laymen; the total membership is under two thousand.

....American Shakers number about 4,000, and are worth about $12,000,000.

....A colony of Germans from Wurtemberg, called the Protestant Temple Society, settled some years ago in the Valley of Jezreel in Palestine, and have been with steady, sturdy industry planting trees and building roads, despite the opposition of the Latin monks of Mt. Carmel above.

....The British Weekly, of London, took a census of worshippers in the churches and chapels of London on a recent Sunday. It showed about 460,000 attendants on worship in the morning, and about 410,000 in the evening. Mr. Spurgeon heads the list, his attendances being 4,519 and 6,070. Next to him comes St. Paul's Cathedral with 1,662 and 3,403. Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, is third, with 1,325 and 2,415. The fourth is Rev. Archibald G. Brown, of the East London Tabernacle, with 1,696 and 1,831; and the fifth is Archdeacon Farrar, with 1,730 and 1,362.

....At Banza Manteka, Congo Valley, more than 1,000 converts are reported as professing Christ up to September 10th. About 870 of these, Rev. J Clark reports, are grown people; the remainder, though children, and some quite young, give clear and cheering evidence of faith in God. There are indications of the working of the Holy Spirit at other stations also, and some most interesting cases of devotion to the Master's cause on the part of the converts. Quite a number of them are almost constantly preaching Christ, even at the risk of their lives.—The Examiner.

....An Anti-Atheistical Society has been organized among the young men of the French Universities, founded on the broadest basis so as to include Roman Catholics and Protestants.

The Reading Room.

For the Holidays.

Messrs. White, Stokes & Allen, in further development of the series of the favorite ribbon-tied books of past years, have prepared for this Christmas season The "Bird-Songs" Series, illustrated by Fidelia Bridges and edited by Susie B. Skelding. There are three numbers: "SONGS OF BIRDS," containing illustrations in colors of Swallows and Arrow-head; SNOW Bunting and Pine Bough; Wrens and Honey-suckle; Seagull and Surf; and appropriate selections of poetry. "BIRDS OF MEADOW AND GROVE," with designs of Yellow Birds and Mullein; Robins and Apple Blossoms; Blue-birds and Morning-glories; Snow-birds and Rose-hips. "SONGSTERS OF THE BRANCHES," in which appear Orioles and Plum-blossoms; Song Sparrows and Wild Roses; Thrush and Sweet-peas; Chickadees and Autumn Leaves. Each includes verses selected from such authors as Dora Read Goodale, Celia Thaxter, John G. Whittier, Edith M. Thomas, Margaret E. Sangster, Olive Thorn Miller, R. W. Gilder, John Burroughs and Keats. Each number presents a prose or poetic selection in fac simile of the manuscript of a popular author. The bindings are various and very attractive. The blended bronzes are decorated with life-like pictures of birds and flowers. The Ivorine binding consists of heavy antique covers, with ragged edges, on which is an Ivorine tablet, bearing designs of birds and the title, and is very elegant.

The designs of these booklets, but of a larger size, with the poems and prose selections and additions to them, are bound together also in one charming volume, entitled "FAMILIAR BIRDS, and What the Poets Sing of Them." The book is a quarto. The cover is handsomely ornamented with a design of birds and a pine bough, with a vine border in gilt. It is a volume of rare beauty.

The same house offers also "FLOWERS FROM DELL AND BOWER," a very attractive holiday book, tasteful and elegant in design and execution. The praises of the flowers are sung by a great company of poets, and their beauty depicted by the skilful pencil of Miss Susie Barstow Skelding. All of the illustrations are beautiful, some of them exquisitely so. The poems include fac similes of the manuscripts and autographs of H. H. (Helen Jackson), Celia Thaxter and Lucy Larcom.

The Calendars for 1887 of this firm will win many admirers. We handed "THE SUN AND STAR CALENDAR" to a competent judge who has inspected a long array of such artistic work, who exclaimed almost immediately, "That is beautiful. That is the prettiest calendar I have ever seen. I must have that." The calendar is of the shape of a silver star resting upon the blazing circle of a sun, encompassing a landscape or a floral design appropriate to the month, and the calendar of the month, under a few lines of poetry. Each month is on a separate leaf. There are two others, "THE CROSS AND CRESENT CALENDAR," and "THE STAR AND CRESENT CALENDAR," no less attractive.

And here glistens the old song of Clement C. Moore, "A VISIT FROM SANTA CLAUS," in all the beauty of full-page colored illustrations by Virginia Gerson. It will just suit the little ones, as they ask how the old Saint comes into the home, and what time he usually does his delightful work.

Messrs. George Routledge & Sons present a holiday list meeting the requirements of young and old. Perhaps nothing they offer will be as generally admired and coveted as "KATE GREENAWAY'S ALMANAC FOR 1887," and "ROUTLEDGE'S JAPANESE ALMANAC." The designs, furnished in great abundance, are quaint and charming, are printed in colors and enclosed in covers bearing hand-painted landscapes or floral designs. Next to these, the admirers of Kate Greenaway and her favorite and easily-recognizable children, will welcome "A APPLE PIE," an illustrated alphabet, from her prolific pencil. The fortunes of the pie are followed through twenty stages in which B bites it, C cuts it, D deals it, etc., till in the last, six little maidens, U, V, W, X, Y, Z, each with a slice, march off to bed. A book which not a few persons will be unwilling to resign to the little people, but will put away with examples of choice art.

Randolph Caldecott has become a household name with young and old in many American families by his own illustrated picture books, by his illustrations of Mrs. Ewing's unsurpassed stories for children, his illustrations of Irving's Christmas and Bracebridge Hall, his drawings for the New York Graphic, the London Graphic and other pictorial journals. Our interest in his career was heightened also by his death at the early age of forty years in St. Augustine. "RANDOLPH CALDECOTT: A Personal Memoir of His Early Art Career," by Henry Blackburn, is, therefore, a book many readers will desire to own. The author quotes freely from Caldecott's letters, and many of the humorous and expressive pen and ink sketches he so often prefixed to his letters are printed here for the first time. The sympathetic recital of his early life is accompanied with nearly two hundred engravings of his varied work as an artist. The book is handsomely bound.

"GREAT CITIES OF THE ANCIENT WORLD" and "GREAT CITIES OF THE MODERN WORLD," separate volumes, by Helen Ainslie Smith (Hazel Shepard), comes to us in second editions, a convincing evidence that they have elements of worth and success. There are few better books to put in the hands of young people, and few that are more instructive and interesting. Besides full descriptions of the characteristic features of the leading cities of Europe, America and the East, there are nearly three hundred illustrations in each book, which give a better idea than any word-painting of the cities themselves and their objects of interest.

"ONE HUNDRED FAMOUS AMERICANS," also by Helen Ainslie Smith, cannot fail to be a profitable and stimulative book to place in the hands of young Americans. The author has grouped these famous American men and women according to the callings in which they gained distinction, and in doing it has subserved a historical, as well as a biographical purpose. The interest of the book is much enhanced by numerous portraits and other illustrations.

It is not often we have placed before us a more charming child's book than "THE BABY'S OWN ÆSOP," illustrated by Walter Crane. The fables are given in capital rhymes which will hang in memory, we imagine, longer than the original prose. But the designs printed in colors over the whole page are the great feature of the book. The expressions of beast, bird and man, the comic attitudes, the wonderful telling of the fable through the pictures, these would have made the old moralist himself smile. Walter Crane's Æsop ought to be in every well conducted nursery.

Messrs. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co. have published new editions at a reduced price of the "DIVINE ORIGIN OF CHRISTIANITY," by the Rev. Dr. R. S. Storrs, a noble and powerful argument built upon the "Historical Effects" of evangelical belief, and of "THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF MRS. E. PRENTISS," with a portrait, one of the most delightful and profitable biographies of Christian experience and usefulness ever put upon record. Every thoughtful minister will be strengthened, encouraged and inspired by the glowing argument of Dr. Storrs, and the life of Mrs. Prentiss will be rarely helpful for Christian women of all ages, married or single.

The same house has collected in a box four volumes written largely in words of one syllable, in an entertaining and graceful style, and printed in large type, for children. Two are entitled "BIBLE STORIES FOR THE LITTLE ONES," "From the Creation to Moses," and "From Joshua to Daniel," by the author of "Earnest: A True Story;" the other two being by Mrs. E. A. Walker, entitled "FROM THE CRIB TO THE CROSS: A Life of our Lord," and "THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS." They are appropriately illustrated and bound in good taste.

....In "WINTER SONGS AND SKETCHES," "Spring Songs and Sketches," "Summer Songs and Sketches," and "Autumn Songs and Sketches," selected and arranged by E. Nisbet and Robert Ellice Mack, four illustrated volumes in paper covers, tied with ribbon, artists and poets have united in an endeavor to add to the enjoyment of the holiday season. Each cover is adorned with a landscape in colors symbolic of the season and with an arrangement of flowers. Within are verses written for these books and selected, and illustrations belonging to the season and drawn for the series. The pictures, printed in monotints, are very pleasing to the eye. The attractions of the books may be estimated when it is known that "Winter Songs and Sketches" is composed of original verses by E. Nisbet and Caris Brooke, with selections from Shakespeare, Bayard Taylor, Tennyson, Austin Dobson, Runeberg, P. B. Shelley, Herrick, Swinburne, and Keats, while the illustrations are by L. Bernard Hall, G. H. Thompson, A. Wilde Parsons, Julius Luz, Robert Ellice Mack, A. M. Clausen, W. G. Addison, G. W. Harvey, and George Clausen. The same lavish outlay of talent has been expended on each book. Exquisite taste has presided over the preparation of these delightful volumes. (E P. Dutton & Co.)

....Few books of any size, or for persons of any age, excel in artistic beauty and excellence the book for little children named "AROUND THE CLOCK," written by Robert Ellice Mack and illustrated by Harriett M. Bennett. It has charming verses, full-page pictures in colors, and exquisite monotone embellishments of the verses. Ernest Nister, of Nuremberg, has lithographed and printed the book with admirable skill. (E. P. Dutton & Co.)

....The familiar gilt cover of THE CENTURY, with its zodiacal symbols, is sure of a welcome from young and old wherever it goes. The volume just made up is the thirty-second. "The Century" is of age. Whoever buys this volume for the holidays gets a library, gets the essence of books, of experience, of observation, and in a most agreeable shape. The abundant wood engravings, excelled nowhere in the wide world, assist the mind while they delight the eye. In this volume are papers on Algiers, Assos, Burmah, Farne Island, France and Indo-China, Heidelberg, and other countries and places; on American Architecture, Ballooning, Co-operation, Evolution and the Faith, The Labor Question, Common Schools, and other topics of the time. Of lighter reading are the Casting Away of Mrs. Lecks and Mrs. Aleshine, by Frank R. Stockton; The Minister's Charge, by Wm. Dean Howells, and other stories by other writers. The War Papers, written by eye-witnesses and participants in the conflicts recorded, furnish vivid accounts of Antietam, Chancellorsville, Farragut's attack on New Orleans, Fredericksburg, Chattanooga, and other engagements, all pertinently illustrated with maps and engravings innumerable. A beautiful, instructive, captivating volume. (The Century Company.)

...."TWO THOUSAND YEARS AGO; or, The Adventures of a Roman Boy," by Prof. A. J. Church, is an uncommonly engaging description of the life of a Roman lad during the closing years of the century before Christ. The style of Prof. Church is unusually clear, graceful and captivating. He conveys the boy to the provinces of the Empire and brings him into intimate relations with famous personages, gives an experience of life on the sea and the land, in the army, and in the residences of officers of the government, of princes, of merchants and of the people. A comprehensive view of the customs and pleasures of the time, of the public games and social entertainments is unfolded, while threads of history are woven in with skill, and the course of a true love adds an element of tenderness. Twelve full-page illustrations by Adrian Marie adorn the pages. The recital will be very much enjoyed by the lads, and, like all really good books for the young, this one will hold the attention of the older members of the family. (Dodd, Mead & Co.)

...."PRINCE PEERLESS," by the Hon. Margaret Collier, is a collection of weird fairy stories dealing largely with the vindictive side of the nature of the tiny folk, but including many marvellous achievements and not a few ludicrous performances. The recitals are new, at least on this side of the Atlantic, and will add fresh sensations to the boys and girls who have exhausted previous collections. The Hon. John Collier has added illustrations which heighten the weird impressions of the tales. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

...."THE MADONNA OF THE TUBS," by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, which appeared originally in Harper's Bazar, in which pathos and humor are combined with effective outlines of character and mental moods, is now really enriched with drawings by Ross Turner and George H. Clements. The illustrations are almost as numerous as the pages. The price of the book is within the means of those who can only look wistfully upon more costly volumes. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

...."ST. NICHOLAS: An Illustrated Magazine for Young Folks." Conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge. The numbers of the year are bound in two volumes and embrace a large amount of capital reading in both prose and poetry, humorous pictures and ingenious puzzles. These volumes are particularly valuable, and to be desired, from the fact that they contain complete the story of Little Lord Fauntleroy, by Frances Hodgson Burnett, which has been neatly published by itself, and is decidedly the child's book of the season; also, many most entertaining contributions by Frank R. Stockton, and characteristic articles by the late Helen Jackson, and a deeply interesting historical biography of George Washington by Horace E. Scudder; also, "Among the Law-Makers," by Edmund Alton, profusely illustrated, which has already been promoted to the dignity of a separate volume.

Had we space, many other exceptionally fine features might be specified. Suffice it to say that our young folks who shall be fortunate enough to receive these superb books, will look long upon their attractive pictures and pore long over their entertaining pages before they weary of their charm. (The Century Company.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The first number of Scribner's Magazine will appear in a few days. The announcement made a few weeks ago in the advertising columns of the INTELLIGENCER affords sufficient evidence that the new periodical has secured the services of contributors highly esteemed and admired wherever English is spoken. But many, as we do, will anticipate a repetition of the brave, sagacious, persistent venturesomeness which was exhibited in the Scribner's Magazine of a few years ago, which gave breadth, vivacity and freshness to much of the periodical literature of this and other countries, and attained some notable achievements. The remembrance is still in vigorous life of the prescience which adopted and cherished the then new process of wood engraving, of the liberality which nourished its first and tentative efforts, and the judgment and taste which steadily removed its imperfections, and of the revolution wrought which advanced American wood engraving beyond all previous attainments. This is only one example of the wise ventures of what may be called the old Scribner's, and a fresh exhibition of this enterprise will be confidently expected from the new magazine when it shall be fairly on its way.

....St. Nicholas for December is crowded with good holiday reading. The opening poem, "In Christmas Season Long Ago," is illustrated by the frontispiece—a beautiful picture of old-fashioned children. "A Scheming Old Santa Claus," by John Y. Coryell; "The Story of Prince Fairy-foot," by Frances Hodgson Burnett; and "The Bamberry Boys," by J. T. Trowbridge, are extremely entertaining. "How a Great Battle Panorama Is Made" is an interesting article, accompanied by many illustrations. "Jack-in-the-Pulpit" allows his readers to look at his portrait, which is quite a charming surprise. Altogether the number is brilliant and fascinating.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

Three Hymns.

BY THE LATE REV. PAUL EUGENE STEVENSON.

I. Peace.

HOW sweet to talk with Thee, my Lord!
What joy in Thy unfailing Word!
My soul doth magnify Thy name,
And every gracious promise claim.

Speak! and my fears and questions cease.
Speak that blest word of Thine, "My peace."
Peace, like a river, through my soul
Shall all its tranquil currents roll.

O, stretch Thy hand forth to my heart—
Thou, who the rude waves' ruler art!
Till, Lord, Thy gentle summons given,
I change earth's peace for that of heaven.

II. An Evening Hymn.

Alone! Yet never lonely,
For Thou, O Lord, art here.
With Thy still presence only,
I may not, cannot fear.
My guard, I need no other
Throughout night-watches long—
Not even is a mother
So tireless and so strong.

Lord Jesu, what shall harm me
In darkness or by day?
Why Death itself alarm me,
Since Thou wilt with me stay?
From Thee no power shall sever;
I sleep, Lord, on Thy breast.
And here, or hence forever,
I waken—to be blest!

III. Christian Unity.

Raise, raise our countless voices,
Church of the Living God!
One sacred name rejoices
All, bought by Jesu's blood.
Though faction's spirit plies us,
Though diverse forms we bear,
One blessed bond allies us,
One glorious cause and care.

Each by His love attended,
Each toward Him daily led;
Each by His arm defended
And of His bounty fed.
O, aid we all, the breaking
Of those blest Latter Days,
When earth and sky, awaking,
Shall sound one note—His praise!

1870.

Secrets Revealed to the Wayfarer.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

WE read Edwin Arnold's "Secret of Death" with a kind of expectancy born of a feeling half desire, half fear, to learn, if possible, something of that mysterious passage of the soul from the body, a passage which we have viewed through our human environments, but of which we confess to ourselves we know nothing.

We scan the brilliant sentences, and what do we find? The yearnings of the ages, the insistence of separate souls "Is there immortal life? Is there joy and peace after death? How shall I gain it?"

Passing along, the lines are full of pearls of thought in the richest setting, we read:

> "The body's death
> Kills not the soul! It hath its city still;
> Its palace, and its hidden proper life!
> Becoming self of self; set clear from sin,
> As the snake casts her slough; made free of flesh,
> Of ache, hunger, thirst, sorrow and death,
> Thenceforth desiring the desirable,
> And thinking ever what is good to think."

We follow on; the two questions which the ages have been sending up with hope or with despair, "Is there life beyond death? Is there life to be desired?" the verse has answered; there remains another, "How may I find this life?" If there is no answer to this, then the future life is valueless to mortals. But from the Sanscrit scroll the poet reads:

> "But whoso once perceiveth Him that is > Without a name, unseen, impalpable,
> Bodiless, undiminished, unenlarged,
> To senses undeclared, without an end,
> Without beginning, timeless, higher than height,
> Deeper than depth! Lo! such an one is saved!
> Death hath not power upon him!"

As we meditate, it is as if we heard "Home, Sweet Home" played by a master, with variations. The genius of the composer may be apparent in his renderings here and there among the harmonies, keeping always near the theme; but how we are thrilled when the notes gather themselves about the key-note and we catch and hold again the old tune with all its associations, tender and strong, sad and joyful!

We study the side thoughts in this "Secret of Death;" we are charmed with the particular conceptions; but we seize the truth of a blessed immortality through a perception of the everlasting God. It is the simple truth to which we cling—the truth which in the Bible is set forth so clearly that the "wayfaring man though a fool may not err therein."

The old conceptions of the relation of the soul to eternity and to its God, veiled often with mysticism, so long as they were according to the highest light of the age, may become inspiring, in a sense, to the soul as well as to the intellect, but let us be thankful for the fuller and more adequate revelation of the soul's needs and of its higher relations through the life, death and resurrection of Christ our Saviour, who came to lift not alone the learned and the mighty, but the simple and the lowly also, and these may always hear the words: "As I live ye shall live also."

Have You a "Sunny Window?"

"THE sprouts of your bulbs are ever so much larger than ours," said Helen Loring to Mrs. Hammond, "and ours were planted first, too. I wonder what has made the difference?"

"Mine have the bright sun all the morning," replied Mrs. Hammond, "and you'd be astonished to find how much faster plants grow that have the benefit of a sunny window."

Plants are not the only things that sunshine, warmth and brightness help to grow. Mabel Hammond and Helen were quietly talking over various matters one afternoon not many days after the conversation with Mrs. Hammond. Mabel was wondering whether she might make an attempt in a new kind of work for her, questioning her ability, and the pros and cons, as we all will—scarcely daring to risk the incipient experiment.

"Do it," advised Helen. "Put that new little beginning into a sunny window; don't keep it in a cold north room; nor you nor I can tell to what it may grow, 'Tall oaks from little acorns,' Mabel."

How many a sudden good impulse, an indefinite premonition, "Oh! I believe I could do that," or "I wonder might I dare try," have been blasted just for the lack of the sunny window development to encourage, and even coax them to grow into stout and sturdy traits, blossoming and brightening lives.

All the lovely characteristics that charm us in others may be ours if we will only be watchful, and give each little aspiration and desire upward the same care and attention we do our plants. We know how much they add to the cheery aspect of our rooms during the winter, and as we tend them, shall we not take the lesson to ourselves and give it heed?

It is a duty that we owe ourselves personally, to take advantage of the "sunny windows."

We have just been studying the lesson about "Walking in the Light." Let us turn our faces, hearts, heads, hands, our very selves, toward and not from the light. "Verily, so shall we bear much fruit."

Christmas Roses.

BY EMMA J. GRAY.

IN the cosy library of the old Hathorne home could be found, on the stormy morning of which we write, four young ladies. Two were ensconced in easy chairs drawn closely up to the blazing logs in the open fireplace. One was lying in restful way on the couch, whose colors made a pretty picture combined with her dainty morning dress. And yet another, the more sedate and thoughtful in appearance of the group, sat by the table, which was partly covered with flosses and chenilles of various colors that were being put in proper place by the busy fingers of her who sat there. All were discussing the reception given the night before at the house of the fashionable Mrs. Allyn. Much was said of the people there gathered, the music, and the dance; also the floral decorations, the palms and other plants, the ivy and the smilax, and numerous other trailing vines, the endless variety of flowers, and particularly of the masses of roses, alike rich in color and effective as decoration. The more thoughtful of the group of which we have written, said, "Did you ever think, girls, how numerous the species of roses are? and also that there is no variety of plants in which the limit of species is more difficult to define?" "Yes," was the reply. "And did you ever think how soothing and pleasing is the odor of most roses? It is now nearly three hundred years ago that Nur Mahal, the wife of the Emperor of Hindoostan, observed an oily substance floating on a vessel of rose water that had been distilled by the heat of the sun.

"The attar of rose is very fragrant; one drop will perfume a whole dressing bureau, and so expensive that an ounce will cost about one hundred dollars—nearly half a million of average roses being used for its production. Among the ancients the rose was sacred to Eros or Cupid, or Aphrodite or Venus; considered ever an emblem of joy, love and purity.

"The rose is indeed endless in variety. The sweet briar, which is everybody's favorite, is a native of Berlin, but grows wild through the States. Its delicate odor and pink color make the gathering of it ever a delight. The field rose is common in many parts of Britain, as well as of our own country, and is frequently trained on walls and trellises. The tube rose has been found in Europe for about three centuries, and is put to many uses here. The damask rose, so rich in color and general effect, is a native of Syria, while the brilliant yellow rose is a native of Germany. The musk rose comes to us from Africa and the south of Spain. Why girls, we could talk all day about roses, and then not begin to exhaust so beautiful a topic. Think, too, of their associations, for they are ever with us in the time of restful ease or in hours of joy and sorrow. Soon the Christmas bells will ring and the Christmas roses bring benediction to more than one heart."

Again the elder of the group spoke, saying: "It is so stormy, I am sure no one will interrupt us this morning, and so, girls, I will tell you a story of what has been a secret for a whole year—the story connected with those beautiful white roses which you each praised and wondered about last Christmas morning. You may remember a little dark-haired, brown-eyed girl called Myra, who used to ask in such a pleading tone if we would buy her pretty flowers as we walked to the spring the month we stopped at Richfield last summer, a year ago. Well, somehow I became much interested in that girl and found, through conversing with her, that she was an orphan, and cared for entirely by an aunt nearly helpless through age and rheumatism. While we were having the merry days there this old aunt died, and Myra was left alone. One morning sobbingly she told me this, and I bought all the flowers she had. She seemed very grateful but was very sad, and I, finding she had neither home nor protector, decided to care for her myself through the liberal supply of pocket money which is ever mine.

"Fearing there might be objection made to this by some one at home, I decided to keep it a secret. As for Myra, no one cared what became of her. So to this city I brought her, and in the home of our good seamstress found a home for her. There, after school hours are over, she is being taught to sew and help in various ways in this plain but Christian home. She was early taught to crochet, and has been able, also, at odd times to make worsted articles, which have been bought by our sewing school and given to the needy little ones who form part of our church poor. She is very industrious, and seems grateful for my kindness, as she calls it, is making good progress in school, and is much loved by those of whom she forms part of the household. Indeed, our seamstress says 'the child is an angel in her house.' Every Sunday-school hour you may see Myra's attentive, thoughtful face as she listens to her teacher's voice, and I feel assured that if her life is spared my own heart will ever sing for joy for whatever sacrifice for her sake I may have made or am making now.

"Some weeks before last Christmas she worked early and late, often beyond her strength, upon the worsted work of which I have spoken, and out of the money which she received from this saved enough to buy me those beautiful white roses which, in her own sweet way, she gave me last Christmas day. No jewel seemed as precious and full of purity and love as did they. I felt, too, she had chosen the flower best loved as her offering to me, for the rose is ever peerless and associated with One who has given to us all things beautiful to enjoy. How fitting, then, that Myra, whom I now think of as my Christmas rose, should have brought as her gift that whose every petal tells the story of the great heart of Him whose birthday is marked by the unfolding of the Christmas roses."

Magazines for the Little Folks.

AGAIN Our Little Ones and The Nursery is commended to those looking for something to please and instruct children of from five to ten years of age. Hardly one of the larger magazines for adults excels it in beauty of illustrations, while the prose and poetry which occupy its pages are just what the little folks need.

Once more The Pansy is heartily commended. It, too, is generously illustrated. The engravings are not as well executed as those in "Our Little Ones," but no magazine in this country has a corps of contributors understanding as well the wants and wishes of children of from seven to twelve years. Pansy (Mrs. Alden) herself has no superior in writing for young people. Faye Huntington has been a constant contributor for years. With these ladies are associated other writers of similar gifts.

The cost of these periodicals is moderate. No one will regret making a Christmas present of a year's subscription to one or both to a child or a group of children.

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

The Bear.

And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep, and there came a lion, and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock:....Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear:....The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear, he will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. And Saul said unto David, Go, and the Lord be with thee."—1 SAMUEL 17: 34, 36, 37.

WE opened our front door this morning to welcome a boy and a bear. They were standing, side by side, beneath the carriage entrance, or porte-cochere. The bear was muzzled, and fastened with a padlocked iron chain to the boy's waist. When they saw us the boy began to sing and the bear to dance on its hind feet. It sang, too, bear-fashion. The boy's clothes were all tattered and torn. No wonder! for the bear kept close to him, putting its fore paws on his shoulders and about his waist. I do hope that bear never seeks to hug him, or attempts to strike him with its long, sharp claws.

When the song and the dance had ended, the boy was asked whether he would like to sell his bear. He replied with a bright, pleasant smile, but very decidedly shook his head to signify "O, no!"

The bear was then directed to drop its fore paws on the ground and to follow its master, still chained to his waist and muzzled, down our carriage road, through the gateway, and up Mountain avenue to the village. There the boys and girls must have been preparing for school, or starting, or walking toward the schoolhouse, when the boy and bear appeared to sing and to dance for their entertainment. I know they were amused, but I hope they pitied the boy and treated him with politeness, which, you know, is "kindness kindly expressed." That bear, I am quite sure, was a brown bear, though its fur looked black. There are varieties of brown bears—some brown, some black, some gray, some yellow. They are about four feet long and two and a half feet high. When they attack a man, generally in self-defence, they rise on their hind feet and endeavor to draw him close to the breast that they may press him to death. They live in forests and feed on small animals, also fruits, vegetables and honey. They are easily tamed and can be taught various accomplishments, such as dancing, handling a gun, and going through a military drill. I would have liked to have seen this morning visitor of ours climb our big hickory tree (which we believe to be centuries old), and then descend, but the chain to which he was fastened was not nearly long enough to admit of such a performance. The boy was, we thought, an Italian. He must feel very much relieved whenever the bear is unfastened from his waist, and he is thus freed from the animal's paws.

There is another kind of bear, taught to perform by the jugglers of India, and easily tamed. It is called the sloth bear, because it resembles the sloth; and also the honey bear, because, I suppose, it is especially fond of honey, though it also enjoys fruits and the white ants with which that country abounds. It moves its lips about, I understand, somewhat after the manner of the chimpanzee, and has two teeth wanting which belong to other bears. These have forty-two. The honey bear has only forty. The Malayan bear decidedly prefers honey to any other kind of food, and with its long tongue, we are told, scoops out honey-combs from hollow trees.

The American black bear, found in our North American woods, has soft and shining fur of even texture, which is made up into robes, garments, and other articles for wear. The poet tells us:

"The fur that warms a monarch warmed a bear."

The black bear feeds almost entirely upon fruits. Our grizzly bear, living on the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, is yellowish-brown; the fur is coarse. This is the strongest and most ferocious of all the bears, and is next to the Polar bear in size. It attacks the bison. The Polar bear is the largest-sized bear known. It is nearly nine feet long, and sometimes weighs sixteen hundred pounds. You know what beautiful white fur it has. It feeds on birds and fish and seals, and also on fruits and vegetables, like other bears, when these can be obtained. It is a great swimmer and diver, and the soles of its feet are covered with closely-set hairs so that it can stand and walk on slippery ice.

When that brown bear walked away from our house this morning, it did not walk on its toes as the lion did which I saw in Central Park. It walked just as we do, upon the soles of its feet.

The Hebrew word for bear is dob, meaning a rough, shaggy animal, as the Syrian bear is known to be. It changes its color with its growth. When a cub, it is dark brown; when nearly grown, light brown; when fully grown, cream colored; then lighter and lighter as the years go by, until the bear, when aged, is nearly white. It dwells in the mountainous parts of Syria. In summer it chooses some high peak for its abode, and feeds on vegetables and fruits. In colder weather it prefers animal food. Occasionally it descends into the valleys and plains in search of sheep and goats, as in the days when David watched his father's flock on the plains and hillsides of Bethlehem. This bear is now mostly found about the Lebanon range of mountains.

When David told King Saul that the Lord had delivered him out of the paw of the bear, the king well understood how great the deliverance was. The paw of the bear, like the paw of the lion, is a terrible weapon. A single blow could have stripped the entire skin, together with the hair, from David's head, or have wounded him fearfully in some other way. Each paw has five claws, and each claw has been compared to a chisel, so fearfully does it rend and tear away that part of the body which it strikes. A sudden blow of the paw would have thrown him down, and then the bear would have bitten him. Or, the bear could have raised itself on its hind feet and struck him with both paws, or drawn him closely to itself in a deadly embrace. From all these possible consequences the Lord delivered David. I believe it was with David as with Daniel. No manner of hurt was found upon him because he believed in his God, who is at all times to His people a very present help in trouble. In every time of need let us look to Him, as David did, to be "our refuge and our strength."

"His grace will not fail us, the hand of His love
Will feed us and lead us to pastures above."

You remember well that sad story of the two bears which came out of the woods near Bethel and tore the forty and two children who dared to insult the holy prophet Elisha. I do not know how old these children were—our Bible calls them "little children," or "young lads." In those days young men were sometimes called by these terms, as Isaac was when twenty-eight, and Joseph when thirty. Perhaps these children belonged to some school of idolatry at Jericho. There were schools of the prophets at Jericho, at Bethel, at Gilgal, and probably in other places, where young men were taught the truths which the prophets learned from God. Over these schools Elisha now presided, as his master Elijah had done until the majesty and power of God had been displayed in his wonderful translation to heaven. I think these words which the young people used, "Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head!" expressed not only their contempt for Elisha and Elijah, but their entire unbelief in God and in His wonderful acts toward the children of men. In telling Elisha to follow his teacher heavenward, they also, I think, showed their contempt for that heavenly home which God has prepared for all who love Him. When those bears came forth from the wood, there was, therefore, no way of escape. David's Deliverer had forsaken them.

Dear boys and girls, this story contains a very solemn warning both for you and me. "With reverence and godly fear" let us put our trust in God. Let His holy name, His holy Book, His holy day, His holy sanctuary, His holy ministers be very dear to us, and let us keep in remembrance these Bible words: "The Lord is with you while ye be with him; and if ye seek him, he will be found of you, but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you."

When King Saul heard the story of the shepherd-boy's deliverance, he said unto David: "Go, and the Lord be with thee." The words were the very ones he wished to hear. To each of you, dear boys and girls, I send these blessed words: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." E. S. C.

"For the King."

HE slowly came into the pastor's porch
And wiped his dusky brow, and sat him down
Like one who is a-weary, yet content.
He was a very poor and ancient man
Of that unlucky race which some men say
Were best swept altogether from the earth.
Then rose the gracious mother of the house,
And made him welcome, and in kindly tone
Said, "You are weary, brother; sit and rest."

Then with a smile that shone in his dark face
Like summer lightning in a dusky cloud,
He said, "I have been working for the King!"

His was a tiny farm—a bit of ground
Rift from the woodland, tilled with his own hand,
And yet the richest corner of the plot.
He set aside and planted it with roots,
Asking God's blessing on the kindly soil.

So all the summer long he tended it,
Kept down the weeds and stirred the mellow ground,
Till wind and rain and sun and nightly dew,
Mixed with God's blessing, had done all their part,
And prospered in the thing whereto they worked.
So then he dug the produce from the ground,
He and his aged wife, rejoicing much
Over the bounteous yield; and on his back
He bore it to his pastor's door and said,
"Take this and sell, and give the price to God!
'Tis His. I have been working for the King!"

I think the King will not refuse the gift,
But when at last He in His glory comes
With all His holy angels round His throne,
The Indian brother will receive award
Of "Well done, good and faithful servant! Thou
Hast faithful been in little, therefore now
Enter thou, friend, into thy Lord's great joy,
And in His house be ever with thy King."

A Little Gentleman.

THE very first snow of the season had come—just enough to slide on, without going in over your boots.

It was a sunny November day, and Ted and Mamie were out on the terrace, all ready for fun.

Mamie wore her blue hood and red mittens. Her eyes matched the hood, and her cheeks matched the mittens. She wanted the first slide down the terrace.

"Oh, please let me, Teddy!" she begged, in a happy flutter.

"No," said Ted; "I'm going to slide first 'cause I'm the oldest. 'Sides, it's my sled."

"Then you're a mean boy," said Mamie.

"Say much, and I'll slide all the time," answered Ted, coolly.

Wasn't it a pity that a quarrel should cloud the beautiful bright day? Mamma thought so. She had opened the window to get a handful of fresh snow, and she heard it all.

"Ted! Mamie!" she called, "I'm going to give Tony and Cleo a bath. Don't you want to see?"

They came, hanging back a little.

"Oh yes!" cried Mamie.

It was yet one of her delights to watch the new canaries bathe.

Ted didn't say anything; he didn't care much about such fun himself. But he looked on while mamma took off the cage-bottom and set the cage over a glass dish full of water on the oilcloth mat.

Tony hopped to the lowest perch with an eager flutter and dipped his yellow bill in the water. Then all at once he seemed to remember something. He looked up at Cleo.

"Chip! chip! chip!" said he.

Cleo understood. "Che-up!" she answered, softly.

Then down she came, and into the water she went, while Tony stood by and sang as if he meant to burst his little throat.

When Cleo had finished her bath he took his, scattering the water-drops like rain.

Mamma looked at Teddy. "What do you think of it?" she asked, with a twinkle.

"I think Tony's a little gentleman," answered Ted, promptly. "And I'm going to be one, too. You can slide first, Mamie."

"No, you can," said Mamie.

It was to see who shouldn't be first, this time! But Teddy conquered.—Youth's Companion.

The Christmas Tree.

AS a matter of course, "Jo's Boys, and How They Turned Out" is to be hung on some thousands of Christmas trees. If not, some thousands of young and old people will be grievously disappointed. Jo's boys have grown old enough to prepare for college and to enter it, and, what is of more importance, old enough to make love, and Jo's girls talk now about George Eliot and Charlotte Brontë and have suitors, but they are the same charming group Miss Alcott introduced to us all in "Little Men." (Roberts Bros.)

As a companion to Miss Alcott, Mrs. Molesworth should be suspended, (we were about to say, hung up,) in the shape of "THE FOUR WINDS FARM," illustrated by Walter Crane the universal favorite. Some people say that the mantle of Mrs. Ewing has fallen upon Mrs. Molesworth. We are not altogether convinced of that, but we are positive that Four Winds Farm is no discredit to the author of that almost unique book, "The Adventures of Herr Baby;" and, by the way, it would not be amiss to hang Herr Baby also on the evergreen, especially if the desire is that all hands have a good time. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE INTERNATIONAL NEWS COMPANY are delivering the Christmas numbers of the Illustrated News, The Graphic, Holly Leaves, Father Christmas, Figaro, Yule Tide and The Queen. Each one, while crowded with pictures, is furnished with a large supplementary rich illustration, painted by a famous artist, and printed in oil colors. Last year the supply of some of these papers was exhausted a week before Christmas, and it is wise to call for them at once.

Boston to New York in 1825.

BEN: PERLEY POORE in his Reminiscences gives the following description of a stage route sixty years ago:

The old stage route between Boston and New York, before John Quincy Adams was President, passed through Worcester, Springfield, Hartford and Norwalk. Passengers paid ten dollars for a seat, and were fifty-six hours or more on the road. This gave way about 1825 to the steamboat line via Providence, which for five dollars carried passengers from Boston to New York in twenty-four hours.

Stage books for the Providence line were kept in Boston at offices in different parts of the city, where those wishing to go the next day registered their names. These names were collected and brought to the central stage office in the Marlboro' Hotel at ten o'clock each night, where they were arranged into stage loads, each made up from those residing in the same part of the city. At four o'clock in the morning a man started from the stage office in a chaise to go about and wake up the passengers, that the stage need not be kept waiting. The large brass door-knockers were vigorously plied, and sometimes quite a commotion was caused by "waking up the wrong passenger."

In due time the stage made its appearance, with its four spirited horses, and the baggage was put on. Trunks, which were diminutive in size compared with those now used, were put on the rack behind, securely strapped; valises and packages were consigned to the depths of a receptacle beneath the driver's seat, and bandboxes were put on the top. The back seat was generally given to ladies and elderly gentleman, while young men usually sought a seat on top of the stage by the side of the driver. When the passengers had been "picked up" the stages returned to the stage office, where the way-bills were perfected and handed to the drivers. As the Old South clock was striking five, whips were cracked, and the coaches started at the rate of ten miles an hour, stopping for breakfast at Timothy Gay's tavern in Dedham, where many of the passengers visited the bar to imbibe Holland gin and sugar-house molasses—a popular morning beverage.

Breakfast over, away the stages went over the good turnpike road at a rapid pace. . . . Providence was in due time reached, and the procession of stages whirled along the narrow street beneath the bluff, swaying heavily with the irregularities of the road. The steamboats lay at India Point, just below the town, where immense quantities of wood were piled up, for each boat consumed between thirty and forty cords on a trip through Long Island Sound.

The New Theology.

THE Catholic World makes this point against a second probation: "We would like to know how a disembodied soul is properly in a state of probation. Is not this life (the union of soul and body) the normal condition for moral action? The sin of Adam, which was the cause of the fall, and the actual sins of all men have been expiated by the sufferings of Jesus Christ in the flesh, because they are the sins of man, as man in the flesh. The work of redemption was consummated when the Son of God expired on the Cross; the glorified body of the Redeemer was on the third day reunited to His glorified soul, because it was fitting that the body should share in the glory of the soul, having been humiliated with the soul. But the resurrection of the Saviour was like what the resurrection of the just will be on the last day. Is it conceivable, then, that a man may depart this life in sin, leaving behind him a body of sin, and, after leaving this world, his soul by itself repent and on the last day be reunited to its body of sin? The whole man must repent, or the whole man cannot be saved For we must all be manifested before the judgment seat of Christ,' says St. Paul, 'that every one may receive the proper things of the body, according as he hath done, whether it be good or evil'—2 Cor. 5: 10."

The Western Christian Advocate objects to the so-called new theology in such terms as these: "Those who hope to conciliate the current skepticism by a restatement of theology are not reasoning well. The attacks of infidelity are not upon the nomenclature and formulas of theology, but upon theology itself. Men are not mistaken as to what theology is because of any antiquated forms in which it is stated; they understand full well what the Bible teaches; no great book is better understood; and the thing the skeptic dislikes is not the phraseology of the book, but what it teaches; his controversy is not with language, but with doctrines, and a restatement of them would not disarm his criticism nor quench his hatred, unless indeed the restatement should set forth new doctrines, and doctrines essentially unlike those which the churches now accept. Vital piety among the people of God is far more effective than any possible restatement of theology would be to correct the skepticism of the age, and make men believe the Bible. Butler's Analogy did some good in counteracting the coarse infidelity of the 18th century, but the Wesleyan revivals did more; and the same principle holds good still."

A Remarkable Work by a Remarkable Man.

THE Canada Presbyterian tells of a Scotchman who is carrying on a great and successful work in North China. He has devised a method of teaching the Chinese blind to read, which is so simple that a few weeks have sufficed to teach hitherto miserably neglected blind beggars to read with fluency.

The benefactor who has in such a wonderful sense opened the eyes of the blind is Mr. W. H. Murray, whose calling to mission work must be traced to an accident in a sawmill whereby he lost an arm, and so was disabled from following his original profession. He therefore sought and obtained employment as a rural letter-carrier in the neighborhood of Glasgow. He was subsequently employed by the National Bible Society of Scotland as a colporteur, and at this time his remarkable facility for languages attracted the notice of some of the directors. It was accordingly arranged that he should attend some classes at the college, though his studies were not allowed to interfere with his regular work. All day long, therefore, he travelled with his Bible wagon, went to bed at nine o'clock P.M., rose at three o'clock A.M., studied till it was time for his classes at eight and nine o'clock A.M., and then began again at a new day's work of bookselling.

Thus he worked steadily through the long, dreary winters in Glasgow, and in 1871 was sent to China.

Mr. Murray's definite work now, as in earlier days, is that of a colporteur of the National Bible Society of Scotland, whose daily endeavor it is to circulate the Scriptures among the millions who for centuries have held in deepest reverence the learned writings of Confucius and the voluminous sacred books of Buddha. The attempt to sell the foreign sacred books was at first attended with manifold discouragements; but perseverance has carried the day, and, thanks to a happy combination of patient gentleness with most resolute determination, Mr. Murray and his pony-cart now rank among the recognized "institutions" of the great capital; wherever there is a chance of effecting a sale, there he takes up his post, no matter at what inconvenience. At the gate of the Examination Hall he stands while the students from every corner of the empire come forth after their labors; and thus in one day about 700 volumes, each containing a Gospel and four epistles, are disposed of. Another day he takes his stand on the bridge at the entrance to the imperial city—the busiest place in Peking, where "all under heaven" pass and repass. Here in one day he sells upwards of 100 books, and knows that they will travel thence to Corea, Mongolia, and the remotest parts of China.

While working for the Society of Glasgow his interest was aroused by the blind who came to purchase books printed on Moon system; thereupon he took lessons in Professor Bell's system of visible speech, and also in Braille's system of reading and writing for the blind, by means of embossed dots. With patient ingenuity he then contrived so to combine the two systems that there seemed every reason to hope that henceforth this might be made accurately to represent the perplexing sounds of the Chinese language, and also to replace the bewildering multitude of Chinese characters.

God's Providence.

YES, for us through the long year glowing,
Old winter's face is a beacon fair;
Winter comes to our hearts, bestowing
Feast and frolic, and all things rare;
But what—ah, what of our friends in feather,
When, whirling round in the gusts that blow,
The flakes are falling for days together,
And the food of the birds lies hid below?

Shall we forget them, not once recalling
The thrush's lilt and the linnet's trill;
Are there no crumbs from our table falling,
Right welcome alms at the window-sill?
Nay, but we'll think of our friends in feather,
When the snow lies heaped round the bare tree's stem;
And we'll say for the rest, in the iron weather,
"Our Father is theirs and He feedeth them."

TUESDAY, DEC. 7.

WHEAT sold here yesterday for cash: No. 1 red at 93 cents; extra red 92; No. 2 red 89 3-4; No. 1 hard Duluth 95, and No. 2 corn at 48 cents. That is the best news we have had for some time. We hope wheat will go up to 90 cents in Chicago and $1 in New York, and remain there for some years. But as prices are and bid fair to become, they mean more money in the pockets of the farmers, and that means more goods purchased—home-made and imported. It means a silk dress and other new dresses for the farmer's wife and daughters, and a buggy for the son to go sparking in, and more weddings and wedding feasts, and the furnishing of new homes, and buying goods from the manufactures, and freights for railroads at remunerative rates, and more work for wage-earners, more demand for labor and general prosperity. Europe will profit by it, for America will buy more from Europe, and European farmers will get better prices for what they produce; and India and Australia and the whole world will be benefited, and the era of depression will pass away. The talk of the workingmen, as they call themselves, that their prosperity is general prosperity has very little in it. General prosperity the world over is dependent on the prosperity of the tillers of the soil. We hope the period of excessively low prices for food is nearing its end, not to return for a generation. Some exporters, backed by large European capital, will buy when prices are down and throw their holdings on the market when prices rise, in order to break the market, for it is to their interest to buy what they must have as low as possible. They have had their way for two or three years. We hope the market will rise in spite of them until wheat at this port shall command one dollar a bushel. The visible supply yesterday in the United States and Canada, east of the Pacific slope, as reported, showed a decrease of 14,557 bushels of wheat, an increase of 315,769 bushels of corn, and a decrease of 243,706 bushels of oats, notwithstanding the very free selling of Northwestern farmers for months past. The supply is only 2,562,836 bushels in excess of that of Dec. 5th of last year, when farmers were holding on to wheat. Quotations yesterday were: Wheat here 89 1-8, at Chicago 78 5-8; corn here 48 1-4, at Chicago 38; oats here 34 3 4, at Chicago 27. European stocks are low and markets steady. Provisions feel the influence of the rise and show an upward tendency.

Imports at this port last week were valued at $8,801,856, and exports at $6,045,201. For the year thus far imports at this port amounted to $397,555,204, against $353,796,953 to the same date last year, and exports to $292,824,425 against $280,112,745 last year. Exchange sold yesterday at $4.81 for 60-days bills and $4.84 for demand for sterling. The steamer arriving on Sunday brought $120,000 in French gold. The import since August now amounts to about $21,950,138.

The banks of this city last week increased loans $6,302,000, reduced their specie $1,725,800, gained in legal tenders $342,400 and in deposits $5,273,600, reduced the surplus of reserve $2,701,800, making it $6,165,950. The rate for money fluctuated from 5 per cent to 20 per cent, the usual rate on call being 6 per cent. Yesterday the rate was 6 per cent.

The Stock Exchange was very active and considerable speculation was indulged in. The sales were unusually large, and the week showed a rise in prices generally.

Cotton closed yesterday at: Dec. 9.38-40; Jan. 9.44-45; Feb. 9.54-55; March 9.64-65. The demand for hay and straw is moderate. Quotations yesterday were: Choice timothy 80 to 85 cents; No. 1, 75 to 80, clover mixed 60 to 65; long rye straw 60 to 70, oat 45 to 55.

The national debt, less cash in the Treasury, was reduced last month $3,005,249, but the interest bearing debt was reduced from $1,153,643,112 to $1,137,749,362. The three per cents are down to $71,154,250. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, indulges in some surprising remarks in regard to the legal tender notes, which he calls the unfunded debt. Not many people will agree with what he says.

IN writing for anything advertised in the INTELLIGENCER, our readers will confer a favor by mentioning this paper.

The old and reliable firm of Messrs. H. P. Williams & Co., 250 Canal street, are displaying an enormous stock of white, gray and horse blankets at prices to suit all means. These goods were all bought before the great advance in wool, so that the popular prices at which they are now being sold cannot be duplicated this season. This firm also deal in comfortables, mattresses, spring beds, feathers, window shades, oilcloths matting, iron bedsteads, store and piano stools and housekeeping dry goods generally. While they do not claim to undersell others in the same branch of business as themselves, their well-known enterprise in buying up entire stocks of goods at the great auction sales enable them not only to sell strictly first-class goods at extremely low prices, but as in the case of their large blanket sale, at figures that are astonishingly low.

Important to Travellers.

When you visit New York stop at the Buckingham Hotel, Fifth Ave., kept on the European plan. Very centrally located for either transient or permanent guests; near the Grand Central Depot and quite accessible by either elevated or surface railroads, also by stages which pass the door every few minutes. This magnificent hotel is elegantly furnished and has splendid public parlors for ladies and gentlemen, smoking-rooms, billiard rooms, private dining-rooms, etc., etc. It has rooms varying in price from $1 per day upwards, also superior accommodations for families wishing to make either long or short stays. The restaurant is unsurpassed and the prices reasonable.

Our readers may find it of advantage to look into the special advertisement of the Western Farm Mortgage Co., of Lawrence, Kansas, to be found elsewhere in this paper. They offer three options for investors, which we believe will readily commend themselves to such as have capital to invest. This company is sagaciously managed by wise and faithful men, and is heartily endorsed by capitalists of national reputation. Many shrewd business men who are highly esteemed among us and have invested large amounts through this company speak in the most complimentary terms of the manner in which their interests have been handled. The capital stock fully paid is $250,000; assets $652,246.02, certainly a strong showing.

Day and Night

During an acute attack of Bronchitis, a ceaseless tickling in the throat, and an exhausting, dry, hacking cough, afflict the sufferer. Sleep is banished, and great prostration follows. This disease is also attended with Hoarseness, and sometimes Loss of Voice. It is liable to become chronic, involve the lungs, and terminate fatally. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral affords speedy relief and cure in cases of Bronchitis. It controls the disposition to cough, and induces refreshing sleep.

I have been a practicing physician for twenty-four years, and, for the past twelve, have suffered from annual attacks of Bronchitis. After exhausting all the usual remedies

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is decidedly the best remedy, within my knowledge, for chronic Bronchitis, and all lung diseases. —M. A. Rust, M. D., South Paris, Me.

I was attacked, last winter, with a severe Cold, which, from exposure, grew worse and finally settled on my Lungs. By night sweats I was reduced almost to a skeleton. My Cough was incessant, and I frequently spit blood. My physician told me to give up business, or I would not live a month. After taking various remedies without relief, I was finally two bottles of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. I am now in perfect health, and able to resume business, after having been pronounced incurable with Consumption.—S. P. Henderson, Saulsburgh, Penn.

For years I was in a decline. I had weak lungs, and suffered from Bronchitis and Catarrh. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral restored me to health, and I have been for a long time comparatively vigorous. In case of a sudden cold I always resort to the Pectoral, and find speedy relief.—Edward E. Curtis, Rutland, Vt.

Two years ago I suffered from a severe Bronchitis. The physician attending me became fearful that the disease would terminate in Pneumonia. After trying various medicines, without benefit, he finally prescribed Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, which relieved me at once. I continued to take this medicine a short time, and was cured. —Ernest Colton, Logansport, Ind.

The Church.

The Puritan.

NARROW, 'tis true, yet deep and high;
His bounded vision climbed the sky;
Scant was the heaven above his head?
That straitened space he keenly read.

Not the far galaxy's expanse
Caught reaching thought or roving glance;
On some great stars he fixed his gaze,
By them he guided words and ways.

The walls that closed his nature round
Were mountains set in solid ground.
Convictions, rock-like, stern, assured,
No misty doubts, his view obscured.

To-day we wide may range, afar
May gaze, and boast a freer air,
Yet fail that clear and steady eye,
That faith which boldly climbs the sky.

Break the Caste in the Churches.

ONE of the first things to be done in order to the evangelization of the cities is to break the caste that prevails in our churches. There are churches in all our large cities in which there can scarcely be found a single workingman or woman. There is literally no place for the poor in them.

I have in the last ten years conducted evangelistic meetings in as many different cities. In these meetings I have seen all classes mingling as freely as if they were political or secular gatherings. I have seen the millionaire banker and merchant sitting by the side of a hod-carrier, and singing from the same book, and his wife, arrayed in silk and sealskin, sitting beside a char-woman, and sharing her book with her; and they both have seemed to like it. This has been true when the meetings have been held in a rink, a music-hall, or a stately church. For the time being Christianity has held ascendancy over Churchanity. For four years I have preached the Gospel in the Academy of Music, in Brooklyn, on Sunday afternoons. It has usually been crowded to the roof with all classes, the rich and poor, the high and low—the majority of the audience being composed of workingmen and others who, for the most part, were non-church-goers. And yet I find it almost impossible to get any of that same class of people into my church. The same difficulty has been experienced by pastors and churches after the close of the evangelistic meetings referred to above. Now, why is this? It is because, in the one case (that of the evangelistic meeting and academy service), they were arranged and ordered with reference to the perfect equality of all before God. The poor man in rags and unshaven, the poor woman in the solitary dress she possessed, were met as cordially by the ushers and shown to a seat, the best one vacant at the time, as the rich man in his broadcloth, and the grand dame in her silks. But the moment these same people present themselves at the doors of our best churches they are met with cold courtesy, compelled to wait till the well-to-do pew-holder is seated, and then perhaps are shown seats near the door, under the gallery or under "my lord's" footstool. It is not to be denied that the man with the gold ring is more welcome and more courteously treated than the man in vile raiment at the door of the church. If we are ever to win back the poor to the Church and to Christ, our whole policy in this respect must be changed. Of course, this means revolution, but it must be done. Whenever we are willing to do it, we will be able to find out how it can be done. It can be done, and yet the family feeling of the church be preserved. What true Christian man or woman is not willing to sit on the pulpit step, if needs be, or on a camp chair in the aisle, if the church might be filled with an eager multitude coming to hear the words of life and salvation. I believe, if our large churches would free their houses and give them up to evangelistic services at night, letting their able pastors preach to the people, or calling an evangelistic associate to do so, and back up the service with hearty good will and personal work, every church in our cities would be crowded to the door, and the work of evangelization would go on uninterruptedly throughout the whole year.—From a Paper read by Geo. F. Pentecost, D.D., before the Congregational Council at Chicago.

WORLDLINESS.—At the Prophetic Conference held in Chicago Rev. Dr. Pierson said: "Our church life is honey-combed and undermined by worldliness. There is little if any practical separation. The bulk of professing Christians, if not wholly worldly, are worldly holy, At the door of this world's frivolties and gayeties they shuffle off their Christian character as easily as an Oriental guest his sandals, and mingle indiscriminately with those who bow at idol shrines of folly and fashion."

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

For Christmas Presents.

SABBATH-SCHOOLS will be seeking books to give at the Christmas festival. The list below may assist in making a choice. The books named would be enjoyed also in the home, and nearly every one is worthy of a place in the Sabbath-school library.

Messrs. Robert Carter & Bros. publish:

BAB, AND WILL, two new volumes of "The Gillettes." Bab is for girls, Will for boys. The set, now completed, consists of six vols., which cost $4.50 in a box. Each volume holds a well-told, profitable story.

THE GUARDIAN ANGEL, by Emily Brodie, is a temperance story, a narrative of the oldest son of a good family, who starts on the drunkard's path, but is reclaimed by a sister's prayers and example, told in an effective way.

DICKIE'S ATTIC, by Catherine Shaw, in a strong way shows how a workman's wife became a means of blessing to the inmates of a London tenement-house to which her husband introduced her. The sufferings of two little waifs, used as beggars, are described with great power. The literary quality of the book is high, the printing and illustrations are in the best style.

NOT SO VERY LONG AGO, by the Author of "At All Times," etc., is a description by a child of a fair English home, enjoying Christmas nurture. The simplicity with which Katie relates her daily life gives both charm and power to the story. The contrast suggested with our American home life adds to the interest of the book.

MY PEARL, by Alida W. Graves, is written to commend the hallowing of the Lord's day—the pearl of days. Reasons for observing the Sabbath, answers to objections, the too strict and the too lax method of observance, are skilfully wrought into a very attractive story.

THE ROSES OF RINGWOOD, by Emma Marshall, is a pleasant English story of three girls, Rosalind, Rosamond, and Rose, the latter being a laborer's daughter and exposed to various trials. Characters well discriminated and descriptions excellent.

Phillips & Hunt publish:

A LITTLE SILVER TRUMPET, by L. T. Meade, is a tender, pathetic story of the lowest life in London,—the hero a lad who earns his bread by whistling in imitation of various birds, who has good impulses. The story will awake helpful sympathy for the lowest of the poor.

OUT OF THE BREAKERS, by Edward A. Rand, belongs to the "Up the Ladder" series, and depicts how a boy tried to do his duty day by day and helped, as well as advanced his own fortunes, in the effort.

The Presbyterian Board has recently issued:

MISS RUTH AND MISS SUSAN, by the late Helen E. Chapman, and THE FAIRFAX GIRLS, by Mrs. Nathaniel Conklin, both excellent. The first is a quiet record of peaceful village life, and is refreshing. The second is a powerful story, involving four young women of strong Christian sentiment, leading on to the scenes of courtship and marriage.

Lee & Shepard publish:

THE YOUNG WRECKERS, by Richard M. Bache, is not a book for the Sabbath-school library, but is a capital book for boys, describing the cruise of a New York boy in 1839 to Havana and Key West, and through the Florida Keys to save crews and cargoes of unfortunate vessels. The excellence of the story has caused the call for this third edition.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

Dec. 19th.—"The Great Invitation."—Rev. 22: 8-21.

Golden Text.—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."—REV. 22: 21.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."—REV. 22: 17.

Introduction.

THE latter portion of the Book of Revelation is taken up with a series of descriptions representing the successive triumphs of Christ over His enemies, culminating in the terrors of the day of judgment. These descriptions are followed by a graphic representation of the glories of the New Jerusalem as the dwelling place of Jesus and His redeemed people. The prophecy probably ends with verse seven, and the remainder of the chapter contains the message of mercy with which the New Testament closes, in contrast with the curse which forms the last utterance of the Old Testament.

The Lesson.

I. JOHN AND THE ANGEL.—Vs. 8, 9.

V. 8.—"I, John, saw these things and heard them." It is characteristic of all John's writings that he constantly refers to his own personal observation or experience as the ground of his testimony. "I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things." The revelation had produced such an impression upon the mind of the Apostle that he came to think of the angel as divine, and fell down in adoration at his feet.

V. 9.—"See thou do it not." The angel could not be tempted to accept an honor which he knew belonged to God alone. "For I am thy fellow-servant." Although widely separated from us by nature and experience of Divine care, yet the angels are associated with the redeemed in the great work of redemption, as the central part of God's great plan of government. "Worship God." His wisdom, love and power, so clearly manifested in the wonders of this book, demand constant and hearty praise.

II. THE TIME IS AT HAND.—VS. 10-15.

V. 10.—"Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book." Some of the prophets of the Old Testament had been commanded to seal up their writings because they referred to events that were still remote, but John is expressly commanded to leave the book unsealed, in order that men might immediately profit by its teachings. "The time is at hand." If we regard the visions in this book as so many symbolic pictures, representing the conflict between Christ and the Prince of this world, then they have been realized more or less fully in every stage of the progress of the Christian Church in the world. Even while John lived that conflict was raging and Christ was winning glorious victories, but the full realization of these blessed hopes shall not be had until His triumph shall be complete.

V. 11.—"He that is unjust let him be unjust still." This verse must be connected closely with the last clause of verse ten. It means that for every individual the time is at hand when character will be fixed and doom made irreversible. Our opportunities for change are few and fleeting, and should be eagerly prized and improved.

V. 12.—"Behold, I come quickly." The actual reappearance of Christ is anticipated by men when their day of opportunity and probation ceases. At that time the future is as fully fixed as it can be at the day of judgment. "My reward is with me." Jesus represents Himself as the great world-paymaster, settling accounts with every man, and giving rewards or punishments upon a basis of justice as well as grace. "To give every man according as his work shall be." The idea that the general destiny of men is to be determined by an arbitrary method is effectually met by this clear statement, that a man's work determines his position before God. This does not preclude the work of grace in giving value to the works of human obedience.

V. 13.—"I am Alpha and Omega." The successive clauses of this verse simply reiterate the statement contained in the first. Jesus here appropriates language in other places used by the Father, and so makes a final definite claim to eternal existence.

V. 14.—"Blessed are they that do his commandments." "That wash their robes." (Rev.) It is thought that this alternative reading is more in accord with the scheme of grace, which magnifies the Saviour's work and minimizes the value of the Christian's works, but in view of the statement of verse twelve, the idea of blessedness following obedience seems legitimate and natural. "That they may have right to the tree of life." The closing chapter of the Bible carries us back to the opening scenes in human history, and we see once more the tree of life, from which our sins had separated us, made accessible, and the Paradise lost by disobedience of man regained by the obedience of Christ.

V. 15.—"Without are dogs," etc. No man will be excluded from heaven who has a character fit for heaven, but no one can attain to such a character without the blood and grace of Jesus Christ. "Whoso ever loveth and maketh a lie." Not only deceivers, but those who willingly suffer themselves to be deceived, being blinded by the god of this world.

III. THE INVITATION.—VS. 16, 17.

V. 16.—"I, Jesus, have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches." The angelic ministries in behalf of the heirs of salvation are greatly varied, but this work of revelation was one of chief importance. "I am the root and offspring of David." This expression is Christ's own answer to the puzzling question which he put to the scribes, How can the Christ be both David's son and Lord? He the root from which David sprang, and the branch which has grown up out of the royal stem. "The bright and morning star." The bringer in of a new and glorious day.

V. 17.—"The spirit and the bride say, Come." It should be noted that the expressions in this verse are referred by many scholars to the welcome which the coming Jesus is to receive, but the ordinary interpretation of these words as a gracious invitation to sinners is the simpler and more reasonable. The spirit in the heart of hearers of the Word is saying, Come; the bride, the Church, through her many agencies is saying, Come. "Let him that heareth say, Come." Individuals who have found the Lord are seeking out their brethren and friends, saying, Come, we have found the Christ. "And let him that is athirst, Come." Lest any should say no man careth for my soul enough to give me an invitation, Jesus here extends to every sinner conscious of his need a warm and urgent entreaty to come. "And whosoever will." This final clause embraces all that has preceded, and gives assurance of life to every one who is willing to have it.

III. THE CONCLUSION.—VS. 18-21.

Vs. 18, 19.—In these verses men are warned against offering their own speculations as substitutes for or additions to God's Word. As originally spoken these warnings could refer only to the present Book of Revelation, but as in God's providence they have found their rightful place at the close of the entire Scripture, they aptly declare the completeness and sufficiency of the Word of God.

V. 20.—"Surely I come quickly." The Lord is on His way; His stately steppings are to be heard among the nations; His victories are increasing every day, yet much remains to be done before He can see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied. "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." This ought to be the earnest prayer of each follower of Jesus, but can we abide the day of His coming? are we ready to greet Him?

V. 21.—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all." These closing words of God's message of salvation need no comment from us.

Lessons for To-day.

1. All who serve God are brethren.
2. God alone is to be worshipped.
3. Each day of life we are forming character and making destiny for ourselves.
4. We cannot be too much in earnest in doing right.
5. Our eternal state depends upon our daily living.
6. Have you accepted the great invitation?
7. Are you saying, Come, to those who thirst?
8. Are you ready to welcome Christ at His coming in power and glory?

How Billy Took His Lager.

"BOY BILLY" was the adopted son of Christian Zende, an honest German, who was much shocked one day at seeing the boy in a lager beer saloon, tossing off a foaming glass of beer. He bade the boy go home, but said nothing till evening. After tea Zende seated himself at the table, and placed before him a variety of queer things. Billy looked on with curiosity.

"Come here, Billy," said Christian Zende. "Why were you in the beer-shop to-day? Why do you drink beer, my boy?"

"O—O—because it's good," said Billy, boldly.

"No, Billy, it is not good to the mouth. I did never see so big faces as you did make. Billy, you think it will taste good by-and-by, and it looks like a man to drink, and so you drink. Now, Billy, if it is good, have it. I will not hinder you from what is good and manly, but drink it at home; take your drink pure, Billy, and let me pay for it. Come, my boy. You like beer. Well, open your mouth. I have all the beer stuff, pure from the shop. Come, open your mouth, and I will put it in."

Billy drew near, but kept his mouth close shut. Said Zende:

"Don't you make me mad, Billy. Open your mouth."

Thus exhorted, Billy opened his mouth, and Zende put a small bit of alum in it. Billy drew up his face. A bit of aloes followed. This was worse. Billy winced. The least morsel of red pepper now, from a knife point, made Billy howl.

"What, not like beer!" said Zende. "Open your mouth." A knife dipped in oil of turpentine made Billy cry.

"Open your mouth; the beer is not half made yet."

And Billy's tongue got the least dusting of lime, and potash, and saleratus. Billy now cried loudly. Then came a grain of licorice, hop pollen, and saltpetre.

"Look, Billy! Here is some arsenic and some strychnine which is used to kill rats!"

"I shall die! O—O—O—do you want to kill me, Father Zende?"

"Kill him! just by a little beer, all good and pure! He tells me he likes beer, and it is manly to drink it, and when I give him some he cries I kill him. Here is water. There is much water in beer."

Billy drank the water eagerly. Zende went on:

"There is much alcohol in beer. Here! open your mouth," and he dropped four drops of raw spirit carefully on his tongue. Billy went dancing about the room, and then ran for more water.

"Come here, the beer is not done, Billy," and, seizing him, he put the cork of an ammonia bottle to his lips, then a drop of honey, a taste of sugar, a drop of molasses, a drop of gall. "There, Billy! here is jalap, copperas, sulphuric acid, and nux vomica. Open your mouth."

"O, no, no!" said Billy. "Let me go. I hate beer.. I'll never drink any more! I'll never go in that shop again! O, let me go! I can't eat those things. My mouth tastes awful now. O, take them away, Father Zende!"

"Take them away! Take away good beer, when I have paid for it! My boy, you drank them fast enough to-day."

"O, they make me sick," said Billy.

"A man drinks all these bad things mixed up in water. He gets red in the face; he gets big in the body; he gets shaky in his hands; he gets weak in his eyes; he gets mean in his manners."

Billy was satisfied on the beer question.—"Little Star," from the German.

HAPPINESS is not dependent on what one has, but on one's estimate of what he has. "I look at what I have not, and think myself unhappy," says a wise thinker; "others look at what I have, and think me happy." Happiness is more likely to be found in the heart of one whom the world deems sore tried, than in the heart of one who seems favored above others. Happiness comes of a grateful trust in God, who has ordered lovingly and wisely all the lot of the trusting one.—S. S. Times.

A MOHAMMEDAN prince of Africa has written a letter to the English authorities begging them not to send liquor to his country.

New York City—The Experience of Mr. Hettrick.

THERE was a time in the history of New York when the whole provision business of the city centred in Washington and Fulton markets. These markets were queer old collections of tumble-down sheds, and to speak as mildly as possible, were not an ornament to the city. They have within a few years been rebuilt, and are now spacious and elegant. But much of the provision business has scattered itself around town among the stores of the green grocers, and a great deal of it has gone to certain new markets which have been built up town. One of the most elegant of these markets is the "Central," at Broadway and Forty-eighth street. For convenience, and for perfect cleanliness it is a model market. Passing through it we find among the butter and produce men Matthew Hettrick, Esq., one of the largest dealers in butter and cheese in the city. Mr. Hettrick has grown up in the business, and is thoroughly familiar with every detail of it.

Although Mr. Hettrick has long been a prosperous butter merchant, he was for many years severely annoyed with catarrh, bronchitis and dyspepsia. A combination like this is enough to make any man miserable.

To our New York correspondent, Mr. Hettrick gave an account of his diseases and his recovery.

"For twenty-five years I had a great deal of trouble with my head and throat. I had both catarrh and bronchitis, which were not only annoying, but very painful. I was treated by the regular doctors, and by specialists who give their whole attention to these diseases. But neither the regulars nor the specialists did me any lasting good. I must have inherited these diseases, for two brothers of mine also had them, and died of them. I am nearly sure that one of these brothers could have been saved, had he taken in time the remedy which has now restored me to health."

"And I may ask what that remedy is, Mr. Hettrick?"

"It is what they call Compound Oxygen. About a year ago I heard of this; I had seen it advertised. First, I sent to Philadelphia for it—the headquarters. Then I found they had an office here on Fifth avenue—No. 148, and I got a treatment or two there, together with a good deal of advice from the physician in charge. Did it do me good? Well, you see me now; you ought to have seen me before I took this Compound Oxygen. My catarrhal discharge was very profuse. My voice was hollow. I was suffering about equal distress from the catarrh and the bronchitis, and added to these was the distress of the dyspepsia. Every little cold I caught would make me worse. I am exposed to a great deal here in the market, where I spend much of my time. There are draughts in all directions, and in raw weather, when doors are constantly opening and shutting, it is enough to give a well man consumption or pneumonia.

"Three days after I began to inhale Compound Oxygen my voice became better, and I was much encouraged by seeing that there was a chance for me to mend, generally. I was surprised and gladdened to see how soon the Oxygen did its work on the catarrh. It was not a mere drying up of the discharges. That I had had before, by the aid of some of the specialists; but let me tell you what a man needs who has catarrh. He wants all the organs of his head and throat put in such healthy condition that the discharges don't come. That is what Compound Oxygen did for me. I can't account for it except on the theory that this remedy strengthened and built up my whole system. It certainly helped me out of all these three troubles together, and at about the same time—catarrh, bronchitis, dyspepsia. My recovery was steady; I was gaining all the time. Sometime, if I caught cold, I would lose a little, but I always gained more than I lost, and so I went on until I got to where you see me now."

"Well, Mr. Hettrick, you now look like a perfectly well man."

"That is exactly what I am, abating only a little for wear and tear, and considering what I endured for so many years. Once in a while I find I have a little catarrh left, and sometimes I feel a little inconvenience from an attack of indigestion. But these things are trifles compared with what I used to suffer. My general health is very good. I can stand all the duties of my business. I can bear exposure to the weather. I eat pretty much what other folks eat, and I have a fair appetite; and I think people who see me would not take me for a man who had been sick."

A remedy which can thus drive out such a three-fold combination of twenty-five-year-old disorder, as catarrh, bronchitis and dyspepsia is something of which every invalid ought to know. Compound Oxygen works such wonders that all people, sick or well, should read the interesting little brochure about it which is published and mailed free of charge by Drs. Starkey & Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia. Also, several other works on chronic diseases.

Rheumatism

We doubt if there is, or can be, a specific remedy for rheumatism; but thousands who have suffered its pains have been greatly benefited by Hood's Sarsaparilla. If you have failed to find relief, try this great remedy.

"I was afflicted with rheumatism twenty years. Previous to 1883 I found no relief, but grew worse, and at one time was almost helpless. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me more good than all the other medicine I ever had." H. T. BALCOM, Shirley Village, Mass.

"I had rheumatism three years, and got no relief till I took Hood's Sarsaparilla. It has done great things for me. I recommend it to others." LEWIS BURBANK, Biddeford, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Mother's Face.

THREE little boys talked together
One sunny summer day.
And I leaned out of the window
To hear what they had to say.

"The prettiest thing I ever saw,"
One of the little boys said,
"Was a bird in grandpa's garden,
All black and white and red."

"The prettiest thing I ever saw."
Said the second little lad,
"Was a pony at the circus—
I wanted him awful bad."

"I think," said the third little fellow,
With a grave and gentle grace,
"That the prettiest thing in all the world
Is just my mother's face."

Lost in Sight of Home.

A FEW months ago, during one of the severe storms that visited Colorado, a young man perished in sight of home. In his bewilderment he passed and repassed his own cottage, to lie down and die almost in range with the "light in the window" which his young wife had placed there to guide him home. All alone she watched the long night through, listening in vain for the footsteps that would come no more; for, long before the morning dawned, the icy touch of Death had forever stilled that warm, loving heart. The sad death was made still sadder by the fact that he was lost in sight of home. How many wanderers from the Father's house are lost in sight of home, in the full glare of the Gospel light! They have the open Bible, overflowing with its calls and promises, the faithful warnings from the sacred desk, the manifestations of God's providence, all tending to direct their steps heavenward, and yet from all these they turn away, waiting for the more convenient season, and are lost at last in sight of the many mansions.—Forward.

The Infidel Judge.

LET us go to our friends and talk with them about Christ. Let us pray for them that they may be converted. If we work in this spirit, instead of a few thousands, tens of thousands will be converted. Let us cry out day and night, "O God, save my unconverted son; O God, save my unconverted wife; O God, save my children."

Coming out of the daily prayer-meeting in one of our Western cities, a few years ago, a lady asked me to go down and see her husband.

I took out my memorandum book to write the name, but when I heard who it was I said: "I cannot beat him in argument."

"Oh," said she, "he has got enough of that. Go and ask him to come to the Saviour." I went to the office where the judge was doing business and introduced myself to him. After I had told him what I had come for, he said I had come on a foolish errand. I said: "Judge, I am no match for you in argument; there is one favor I will ask of you, and that is, that when you are converted you will let me know." He laughed at me and said: "When I am converted I will let you kuow," with a good deal of sarcasm. A year and a half after he said to me:

"I come to-day to tell you that I have been converted; and I'll tell you all about it. One night, when my wife and children went out to meeting, I began to think: 'Suppose my wife and children are right, that they are on their way to heaven and I to hell, and that I shall be away from them through the ages?' My second thought was: 'You believe God created you; He is able to teach you. All is dark beyond the grave; cannot He give me light? Yes.' The next thought was: 'Why don't you ask Him?' I was too proud to go down on my knees, so I prayed, 'O God, teach me.' Things began to get very dark. I went to bed and pretended to sleep. My wife prayed, and I knew that she was praying for me. I kept crying, 'O God, teach me.' I changed my prayer: 'O God, take away this burden.' The next day I went without my breakfast, gave my clerks a holiday, closed my office doors and cried: 'O God, for Christ's sake take away this load of guilt.' My trouble rolled away. I asked was this conversion. While thinking of going to ask a minister, a passage came to my mind that my mother taught me when a boy, that, if we believe what we ask, God will grant it. I met my wife in the hallway and said: 'My dear, I have been converted.' She could not believe it, though she had been praying for me twenty-one years."

That man afterward went up to Springfield, and there told the senators and legislators with whom he had associated for years how he had been converted and converted.—D. L. Moody.

Rheumatism

Usually settles in the back or limbs, and often so completely overpowers its victims that all business and labor have to be abandoned. Our readers should remember that Hood's Sarsaparilla is not recommended as a positive specific for rheumatism; its proprietors doubt if there is, or can be, such a remedy. But many people who were most severely afflicted state that they have been positively cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla. The disease is often the result of impure blood—hence the power of this great medicine over it. Its success in many severe cases justifies us in recommending its use to all sufferers from rheumatism. 100 Doses One Dollar.

No other remedy is so reliable, in cases of sudden colds, or coughs, or for any and all derangements of the throat and lungs, as Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. This wonderful medicine affords great relief in consumption, even in the advanced stages of that disease.

Catarrh is a very prevalent and exceedingly disagreeable disease; liable, if neglected, to develop into serious consumption. Hood's Sarsaparilla, acting through the blood, reaches every part of the system, effecting a radical and permanent cure of catarrh. 100 doses $1.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by David W. Lewis & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York.
Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is 5 ₩ cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ ₩ cent.
Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, December 4, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 28,316 pks.; exports, 625 pks.

Elgin butter (and that means in this market any butter up to the Elgin standard of quality), is ready sale here at about 30c. Fresh Western imitation creamery or ladle-packed butter, clean flavored stock, is quite in demand at 20a22c. Low grade Western, ranging from 10a15c., is selling well. There are some creameries in Connecticut and Massachusetts sending fine fresh butter here which sells well, and it is wonderful how much these States are doing in fine winter butter considering the resources at their command. These fresh last week's makes come and go from hand to mouth, but the body of the stock on the market is held summer and fall butter, which is kept and carried and parcelled out for winter trade. The holders of this stock have perishable property to deal with, of most delicate constitution, odorous, volatile flavors representing perhaps half its value, and in cases capable of a fall off of 50a75 ₩ cent. It is natural, therefore, that the market nerves (so to speak), of such a delicate valve should be as quick and as sensitive as are the qualities of the product they represent. The feelers of the butter merchant must always be out. He gauges value by the freshness of his product, and is more or less fresh and impulsive in his market movements. As soon as sales halt or stop anxiety begins, and even though there be a good long winter ahead, he must take into account the thousands of cows and tens of thousands of busy fingers every morning and evening pulling down on the butter market. This week on the body of stock sales have halted and prices on held stock are more or less irregular. There has been no strong, steady current of sales to register prices, and at the close they are as various as are holders' views on the situation. We quote:

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 32,043 boxes; exports, 9,116 pks.

The cheese market has more than for a number of years had its own field to itself. The skimmed cheese nuisance during the summer was quite generally abated, and even this fall quite a portion of the butter creameries sent their skim milk where it would do the most good—back to the farm instead of putting it into skim cheese to an extent which would clog and clutter up the regular cheese trade, and the benefit of this course has been apparent here. The market closes strong where it is, with 12½c. for fine white Septembers, and perhaps 12¾a 13c. asked for fancy colored cheese. We quote:

THE ADVERTISING columns of the INTELLIGENCER for a few weeks past have contained a very full list of the books of various kinds published for the holidays, and will be found helpful by those desiring books for presents. The descriptions on the book page have been made carefully and conscientiously, accuracy having been especially aimed at. If those of our readers who have found these advertisements and reviews helpful will kindly mention the fact to the publishers when making their purchases, they will render us an important service.

HOSPITAL SATURDAY AND SUNDAY in this city fall always on the last Sunday of the year and the Saturday preceding it. Then collections are taken for the hospitals, of which the Association represents twenty-seven. Last year the various collections amounted to $46,085.38, an advance of $9,542.63 upon those of the previous year, and of $3,022.64 upon those of 1883. The religious organizations of the city gave about $30,000 of the receipts. The Association, which receives and pays out what is contributed, with propriety requests that the gifts this year be undesignated, on the ground that the distribution made by it is upon the basis of the free work performed by the hospitals. The chief design of the collections being to meet the expenses of the charitable work done by these necessary institutions, it seems most wise to leave the proportionate distribution of what may be given to those who know accurately how much of that work each hospital is doing. The Association is worthy of confidence, the end it seeks to attain commends itself to every citizen and deserves a very liberal support. The hospitals really need more than twice as much as they receive from the Hospital Saturday and Sunday collections.

ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN refused to allow the funeral of the late ex-Judge Alker to take place in the Cathedral in this city. The ex-Judge was one of the Managers of the House of Refuge, the institution which the Romanists have so long endeavored to convert into a Papistical school, an effort with which the Judge had no sympathy and which he refused to promote. Therefore, the Archbishop decides not only that this funeral shall not be held in the Cathedral, but that no Romanist holding an official position in the House of Refuge shall ever be honored after death with a funeral from the Cathedral. Besides, the Archbishop has reprimanded, not to say warned, Dr. McGlynn, the popular pastor of St. Stephen's Church in this city, on account of his open adherence to the notions of Henry George in regard to property. It was said that Father McGlynn had been ordered to Rome to explain his conduct to the Pope, but that seems to be an anticipation of what may occur. The Archbishop, in his declaration against the theories of the socialists, quoted the language of a Papal encyclical in support of his position—language, as it no doubt seemed to many, of very doubtful interpretation, leaving an excellent opportunity for the Pope to explain it to mean something differing widely from what it seems to mean. Such dubious utterances from the Papacy on practical questions have often been resorted to, to gain time and ascertain which is to be the winning side. But the Archbishop quoted the Pope as condemning the theory of Mr. George, and the Archbishop is no near the Cardinal that he speaks as the highest authority in this large and important diocese. To be sure, if a strong opposition to the Archbishop's declaration should be developed, the Cardinal is in reserve, to step in and modify the pastoral to such an extent as may be necessary in order to allay a discontent that might lead to a disruption or tend to weaken the power of the hierarchy.

The Archbishop is criticized by some as transcending his authority and by others for unwise action. But the Archbishop is right, and it is to say that that these lines are written. He is making a legitimate application of the principles on which the Roman hierarchy is founded, and is simply a faithful servant of his Church. The principles are wrong, are an unwarranted assumption of authority, and are to be opposed to the utmost by every lover of liberty, justice and true progress; but they are the principles of the Roman Church. The Archbishop is simply doing his duty, simply maintaining courageously the discipline of his Church, and in these easy-going days it is impossible not to admire a man who has pluck enough to do what he has solemnly engaged to do, although it is very unpopular. He is exhibiting also to the community the real character of Romanism. Everybody can see what a despotism the hierarchy is, and a great many people will recoil from it.

EUROPEAN ARMIES.—Europe is uneasy under apprehensions of war. The German Government asks for an increase of the army in view of the preparations of other powers, and the French administration insists upon additions to the troops of the Republic. Besides, there presentatives of European powers have recently been visiting the manufactories of arms in the United States, it is supposed to make contracts for rifles and ammunition. At such a time inquiry is made into the military strength of the nations, and it is found that Great Britain maintains a regular army of 198,000 men, Russia an army of 3,000,000, while Germany and France are each so organized as to be able to put into the field not far from 2,000,000 of men. Russia maintains her army and navy at an annual cost of $230,512,500, France at a cost of $168,653,915, Great Britain, $155,603,775, Germany, $113,123,745, and Austria, $67,069,975. This expenditure represents enormous forces. The people are heavily burdened to maintain these peace establishments, while war would add immensely to the tax on their resources. The Crimean war increased European national debts by thousands of millions, and a conflict between the larger and more destructive forces of to-day would be likely to augment the national burdens to a degree that would lead to revolution.

CURIOSITIES OF UNBELIEF.—In the Tribune's notice of Frothingham's "Life of W. H. Channing" we find an amusing statement of one of Mr. Channing's vagaries. When happily settled over a Unitarian congregation in Cincinnati, he after three years "declared that he could no longer preach a gospel in which he had ceased to believe, so he resigned and returned to Cambridge. His people, whose liberality in matters of belief must have surpassed even his own, appear to have thought his change of views no disqualification, and besought him to remain on any terms, 'even as has been wittily said, offering to pay him no salary.' A member of the society being asked afterward why Mr. Channing left, declared that he never knew; 'he thought it was because the minister was of opinion that Jesus Christ did not understand his own religion.' This was much nearer the truth than Mr. Frothingham is disposed to admit. Mr. Channing believed that Christ, under the influence of powerful excitement and the impression of Jewish associations, held exaggerated and erroneous views of his own mission. He claimed the power to work miracles because his love for man was so intense that he wished to work them, and he mistook this impulse of beneficence for the supernatural gift. His followers were too deeply moved by his goodness to be accurate reporters of his acts. The gospels, therefore, were not to be trusted. Christ was not what He was reputed to be. Christianity was not a divine institution. There was no revelation from heaven and no divinely established Church."

Mr. Channing was not the first, nor will he be the last, of those who think that they understand Christ's religion better than He did Himself. They remind one of the Saviour's thanksgiving that God had hid these things from the wise and prudent, and revealed them unto babes. Some men know too much for the Lord Jesus to teach them anything.

The Records of Crime.

THE daily reports of criminal acts in the newspapers, revolting as they are, have their uses. They are a revelation of the moral character of a considerable part of the population. They indicate a general ungodliness and moral degradation. No social rank is exempt. Cruel, vile, monstrous deeds are committed by men and women, who have been carefully educated in the best schools, have been reared in comfortable homes or even in refined domestic and social circles, as well as by those who have lived all their lives among the ignorant, depraved, profane and polluted. The crimes recorded are also of the most brutal and shocking character, and in cruelty, sensuality and utter fiendishness have not been surpassed among savages or pagans in any age. The guilt of these crimes is aggravated by the fact that they are perpetrated in the light of the highest and purest morality and at a time and in places when and where charity and love are exhibited in a degree and to an extent never before equalled. In close neighborhood to patient, self-sacrificing and lovely deeds of heaven-born charity, deeds utterly shameless, absolutely regardless of the rights and happiness of others, and thoroughly diabolical, occur. Despotic and heartless feudal barons were not more cruel to the weak and unprotected, to rivals and opponents, than are the men of evil deeds, exposed to the light in the daily journals.

These reported crimes are also the last fruits of a preceding moral decline and are also the blossom and fruit of opinions, of low moral codes, of a course of conduct prevailing among a large class. No one suddenly becomes most base. The man at last guilty of a shocking crime has been treading the downward road probably for years. The daring criminal is also the representative of a class who, by natural timidity or by circumstances specially restraining, are withheld from extreme offences, but who are as wicked and vile as they dare to be and at heart are thoroughly corrupt. The prevalence of known crime as an indication of the extent of unknown iniquity awakens deep anxiety.

Day after day vile and cruel, dishonest, unrighteous and brutal deeds are reported from every quarter of the land. Only by an effort can one overcome the power of such disclosures and records to harden the heart, to destroy moral sensibilities, and to create a desire for such recitals of human degradation. Pope wrote truly in his famous lines:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

But there are those who, in a large degree, look upon this moral pollution and brutality as the perfectly holy God does, to whom it is more and more abhorrent, and in whom a desire to rescue men from the bondage of sin waxes stronger and stronger. All Christian men and women should strive for such a disposition, until they are moved by a mighty impulse to engage in an earnest, resolute, persistent endeavor to deliver men from the power of Satan and to lift them out of the corruption in which they are sinking. Besides, more should be made of righteousness in the churches. The holiness of God, His majesty, the perfect righteousness of His government, the certainty and the fearfulness of the Divine punishment of sin, should be faithfully declared. "Stand in awe, and sin not," should be heard in no uncertain tones from every pulpit. There is need of a brave and determined endeavor to create a God-fearing people. It is not to be denied that the fear of God, so often insisted on in the Word of God, so constantly present in all the best days of the Church, remains now in but a few hearts in the Church and has almost ceased to be a motive among men not in the Church. The mercy of God has been declared as though it were the only Divine attribute. "God is love" is heralded and is carried on the wings of every wind, but how seldom are sinful men told that the God on whom they are dependent, who rules over them, who will decide their eternal state, is "glorious in holiness."

The people of the United States to-day are in great need of a declaration of the wages of sin, of the infinite perfection of God, of such a presentation of the Divine nature as will produce the fear of the Lord, and of the certainty of the punishment of sin. This land to-day needs that its pulpits shall make God great.

Moreover, this is no time to indulge in religious speculations, to waste time and delay effort while considering what is possibly possible, or for misty, hazy, indefinite announcements of religious truth. The reports of crime in the daily journals call for the most hearty and direct endeavors to teach men their responsibility before God for the deeds done in the body, and for the most resolute efforts to rescue an evil and perishing generation.

"Old Colony" Papers.

Pontius Pilate.

II.

THE next procedure of this feeble-minded man is a symbolic act, which a Jew would readily understand. He took water and washed his hands before the multitude, declaring, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person, See ye to it." I wonder if Pilate really thought that "water could wash off blood," that "the hands could cleanse the heart," or that the claim of irresponsibility would transfer the guilt to others. How little that darkened heathen realized, that this very blood which he was about to shed could alone remove the stain of its own shedding!

But the people—into whom the devil would seem to have entered as completely as into the Samaritan swine, to drive them on to destruction—were as ready to take the consequences as he was to shake them off. And their wild cry went up into the ears of the Lord God of Sabbaoth, "His blood be upon us and on our children!" The answer to that mad and murderous prayer was read erelong by the lurid light of their burning Temple, and echoed through the world in the crash of their city, and in the shrieks and groans of the million and a quarter who perished from fire and sword and starvation during that most awful of sieges. We read the lengthened answer to this day, after 1850 years, in a nation peeled and scattered, judicially blinded, and followed by the odium and proscription of mankind.

But little recked the Roman of all this. He takes his seat in the portable tribunal from which judgments were officially promulgated, and pronounces his sentence. The full demands of Caiaphas and his bloodthirsty crew are conceded, and in Pilate's person the Roman Empire bows its pride and power to a clamorous mob of Jews. They even got, in addition, the terms which he had offered. For he scourged Jesus, as well as delivered Him to be crucified.

He might at least have spared the majestic sufferer the wanton insults of his own soldiers. But when the heart has once crucified its own manhood and sense of justice, it is not likely to make a very stout resistance to a further wrong. There was only one lower step of meanness for him, and this was to turn Jesus into the common hall and suffer the pretorian band of coarse and cruel men to strip Him, put on Him a robe of mock sovereignty, press down upon His forehead a sharp crown of thorns, and then bow the knee before him in derision of his claim to a royalty which Pilate well knew they utterly misunderstood. He had, moreover, seen enough of his prisoner to realize that He was not one to be jeered at and pushed about by a brutal soldiery, and how much more keenly such treatment would cut than the lash. I can forgive Him for everything sooner than for this. I cannot think that, coward as he was, he a Roman officer was afraid to refuse his men an idle gratification. I can only understand such gratuitous injustice on the supposition that his mean nature was tempted to humiliate one whose superiority he felt, or that in his restless and self-reproachful mood he instinctively sought to wreak his feelings upon the most defenceless object at hand.

But this wanton insult of an unresisting and majestically silent victim soon wearied the men, and wrought its own reaction in the vacillating mind of the Governor, and he essayed a final effort to move the people. Pitiful spectacle of feebleness and irresolution! A judge, whose sentence has scarcely gone out of his lips, begging the mob, as if it were a court of appeal, to annul it for him and permit him to be just! He brings forth Jesus in His purple rags, with His bleeding brows and lacerated form and the soldiers' spittle on His face and person, hoping to excite their compassion. He says—not as at another time mockingly, "Behold your King," but—"Behold the Man," your suffering fellow-creature, your outraged countryman! Will not this suffice? But the same inhuman cry rose the louder as the prey was kept from their fangs, "Crucify Him, crucify Him! We have a law, and by our law He ought to die because He made Himself the Son of God." They have grown so bold as to no longer care to misstate the real ground of Jesus' condemnation by the Sanhedrim.

Pilate's ear catches that word, "Son of God." Vague recollections of Roman mythology concerning incarnate deities, the mysterious dream of his wife, and the strange power which his prisoner's words and bearing have gained over his mind, combine to awaken a new and nameless terror. His superstition is aroused, and he goes into the Judgment hall to ask Jesus bluntly, "Whence art thou?" But no reply is elicited.

Pilate's mind seems now made up to release Him, so impressed is he by the man and by all the circumstances of that exciting hour. And possibly he would have found some way of doing so, but for a voice which speaks out from the crowd and is taken up by the multitude: "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend!" The wily priest has taken the measure of his man, and the people have learned their lesson well. At that significant word, all better feelings, all religious terrors, vanish. The man, the judge, the superstitious pagan give place to the politician, the placeman, the poltroon. Nothing must endanger in the slightest degree his reputation for zeal in behalf of that dread and suspicious despot, whose favor is to him the breath of life. The fate of Jesus is sealed. "The sentence no longer sticks in his throat, Let Him be crucified!"

He has only spirit enough to indulge in the paltry revenge of nailing over the cross a placard containing the words, "King of the Jews," and refusing to accede to the priests' remonstrance that he should alter it so as to read, "He called Himself the King of the Jews." He also takes a spiteful pleasure in annoying them by giving up the body to Joseph and Nicodemus, instead of having it consigned to the common burial-ground of criminals, and gives a sullen and snappish answer to the demand of the Sanhedrim for a guard of soldiers at the grave.

Thus much, and no more, the Scripture tells us of this miserable man. Beyond his connection with the death scene of the Redeemer, he is as insignificant in the eyes of Inspiration as the veriest clown who shouted himself hoarse in the crowd before his doors. It may be of interest, however, to know that the very evil which he dreaded finally befell him. On the complaint of some Samaritans he was sent to Rome by the Governor of Syria, and there deposed from office. After a fruitless endeavor to regain the Imperial favor he died by his own hand, "wearied with misfortunes." There is a striking legend that he "sought to hide his sorrows on the mountain by the Lake of Lucerne, now called Mount Pilatus, and after spending years in its recesses, in remorse and despair rather than penitence, he plunged into the dismal lake which occupies it summit." And according to popular belief "a form is often seen to emerge from the gloomy waters and go through the action of washing its hands; and when it has done so, dark clouds of mist gather around the bosom of the infernal lake (as it is called) and wrap the whole of the upper part of the mountain in darkness, presaging tempest and hurricane." Who but must fear that this superstitious myth is too true an allegory of the unwashed guilt which many waters cannot cleanse, and of the blackness of darkness to which the Lord hath "reserved the unjust?"

The key to Pilate's character is found in the skeptical inquiry, "What is truth?" His was the creed of the agnostic and the materialist: I believe only what I see; Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. This soulless creed made him a selfish and slavish trimmer, a moral coward, afraid of Tiberius, afraid of Caiaphas, afraid of the mob, afraid to do right because it is right, and hence unreliable in any of those crises where principle comes in collision with personal or political expediency. There can be no moral firmness where there is not an underpinning of vital faith in God, and in the things that are unseen and eternal.

It is worth while to add, that if you want the basest and most cruel acts performed, you will find the most likely tool not in the man who is esteemed the most brutal and ruffianly, but in the morally weak and selfish man, of however respectable standing or good repute.

It is worth while, also, to admire the way in which the Omnipotent makes use of worldly and wicked men. Pilate cared only for himself and his career. God made him a main-spoke in that living wheel of His Providence, which brought about redemption for mankind.

PRINCETON, N. J., December 1st, 1886.

A Christmas Carol.

HARK! the merry Christmas bells!
How their gladsome ringing
Once again their story tells
Of the angels singing
O'er the fields of Bethlehem,
In the early dawning,
When they chanted "peace on earth"
On that Christmas morning.

Chorus.—Ringing, ringing, merry Christmas bells.
Joyful is the story
Which your music tells.

Tells us of the wise men, led
To the infant lowly,
Slumbering in a manger bed,
Yet the High and Holy.
From those Eastern lands afar
Precious gifts they brought Him:
In the sky a glittering star
Pointed as they sought Him.

Chorus.

Down through ages passed away
Comes to us the pleasure
Which the Christmas bells to-day
Ring in joyful measure.
We may catch the angels' song
In the starry heaven,
When the Babe, the Virgin born,
Unto us was given.

Chorus.

So we chant the glorious hymn
Angel voices taught us:
Peace on earth, good will to men,"
Christ our Lord hath brought us.
Once a child in manger laid,
Now the Prince of Glory!
Fill the air, oh, Christmas bells
With the wondrous story.

Ringing, ringing, merry Christmas bells;
Joyful is the story
Which your music tells.

Prof. Briggs on Messianic Prophecy.

THIS new volume from the press of the Scribners' bears fresh testimony to the learning and ability of its accomplished author. The subject he treats is one that has often been handled before, but never with so much force and originality. The book is the outcome of long, patient and independent study, and every page bears the marks of the writer's individuality. It is no small matter to grasp the leading theme of the Old Testament, pursue it through its whole extent, digest all the details, arrange them in a scientific system, and fortify each step by appeal to the original. This Dr. Briggs has done with very great success, and his book will be heartily welcomed as an important contribution to the literature of the subject, and one that no student can afford to neglect. It is particularly helpful and stimulating in its perception of the fact that the Messianic idea pervades the whole volume of the older Scripture, and is the underlying thought of history and psalm and prophecy, so that without resorting to forced or mechanical interpretations, one can yet find definite references to Him who was to come in places where the careless reader would scarcely expect to see them. The author, in citing the sacred words, often uses the Revised Version, to which he pays a handsome compliment in the preface, but whenever it seemed to be required makes a new rendering of his own, which, it need not be said, is always worthy of attention. A great deal of criticism is scattered over the pages, oftentimes acute and novel, and usually expressed with great plainness, so that one is at no loss to perceive its meaning and the grounds upon which it rests. In this respect the book will be gratifying to all students of the Word.

But with all the varied excellencies of the work, there are some very serious drawbacks. One of these is the author's method of dealing with the Hebrew text. In more than fifty places he rejects the Massoretic reading, and resorts to that suggested by one or more of the various ancient versions. Sometimes, too, he maintains that passages have been omitted which should be supplied, and again, that there are spurious additions which have crept in from the margin, and should be dropped. Often these criticisms have been prompted by the author's theory of Hebrew versification, which most scholars consider fantastic in the extreme. The 40th Psalm and the 69th he chooses to consider as one, and accordingly prints them in his own fashion, first, twelve verses of the fortieth, then thirty-three verses of the sixty-ninth, then the last five verses of the fortieth, while the three concluding verses of the sixty-ninth are coolly dropped as "a later liturgical addition, not properly belonging to the Psalm." For this arbitrary dealing we think that there is no excuse. For while the two lyrics have the same general subject and character, they are distinguished by the fact that one contains imprecations upon the foes of the sufferer, and the other does not. To say, as many critics do, that the two have a common origin is one thing, but to combine them into a single whole with transpositions and omissions is quite another. It is taking an intolerable liberty with the text. An additional instance of this kind of dealing is seen in the case of Psalm 144. The last four verses are detached from the rest, and set adrift like an orphan to find a resting place where they can. Not the shadow of a reason is given for thus injuriously mutilating what is indeed a composite psalm, but nevertheless one that has a complete unity as it stands.

Another unfortunate feature of Dr. Briggs's work is its dismemberment of various books of the Bible. It appears that he firmly believes in the Pseudo-Isaiah, or "the great unnamed," as he calls him after the fashion of Ewald. This does not mean simply that the last twenty-six chapters of Isaiah are the production of a writer in the exilic period, but it cuts a deep gash into the former part of the book, denying that chapters 13 and 14, 24–27, 34 and 35 are from the pen of the man who lived in the eighth century, B. C. This we think subverts the whole hypothesis. Nothing can be more clear than that the original editor or collector of the book, be he who he may, considered all these writings (chaps. 1–39,) as the product of the same author, and he certainly had a better opportunity to know the truth than those who lived twenty centuries after him. Dr. Briggs gives as the reasons for holding these portions to be the production of exilic writers, (1.) their historical position, (2.) their style, (3.) their theology, (4.) their depending upon Zephaniah, Jeremiah and other prophets, (p. 294). The last three of these are mere matters of opinion or taste, upon which no valid conclusion is possible. The first one, as conceived by the school of Kuenen, rests upon the impossibility of the supernatural, but, as given by Dr. Briggs, rests upon the assumption that prophecy must arise out of the circumstances of the time, that the historical position of the prophet must be the basis of his prediction, for this alone makes the prediction useful to his contemporaries. Isaiah lived in the Assyrian period, and what had he to do with the Babylonians? To this it may be answered that the embassy of Merodach-Baladau, stated in chapter 39, shows that Babylon was well known in Hezekiah's day; that the last words of Jacob, (Gen. 49,) the Blessing of Moses, (Deut. 33,) and the final utterances of Balaam, show that prophetic inspiration may easily overlook centuries; and that the burden of the second part of Isaiah is not nearly so much the deliverance from Babylon as it is the fulfilment of the Messianic idea in the change of dispensations—a point which was just as interesting and relevant in the eighth century before Christ as it was at any time during the exile. It may be said, moreover, that there are in the second part of Isaiah references to the day of atonement, (c. 58,) to the offering of sacrifices, oblations and incense, (43, 66,) to oppressions of one class by another, (58,) and to various forms of idol worship on hill-tops and under green trees, and to the sacrificing of children in clefts of the rocks, (57,) which are wholly unsuitable to the situation of the people in exile, and naturally presuppose that the persons spoken of are still in their own land, where all these things could and did take place.

As to the anonymous author, Dr. Briggs says, (p. 292,) "It was not likely that he could safely attach his name to his predictions, or that they could be circulated in public during the period of the Babylonian supremacy." But if so, why did not the same reason operate in regard to Jeremiah, whose announcement of Babylon's downfall was just as clear and positive as Isaiah's? Again, as has been well said, that a writer, confessedly of the highest genius, living at a most critical juncture and producing such a splendid and effective series of prophecies, should have left them without so much as a trace of his own personality about them "is a phenomenon of literary history compared with which the mystery of Junius is as nothing."

The book of Zechariah is broken into three parts. The first eight chapters are assigned to him, the next three are ascribed to a prophet living in the time of Hezekiah, while the last three are said to be post-exilic, but by another and later writer than Zechariah. Here again the argument is from the historical situation of the prophecy. Yet the claim is simply absurd. "No explanation of the whole section (9:1–10:17) is possible, if it be not gained from the history of Alexander the Great," as even a free-thinking critic has said. But if so, then the prophecy has no application whatever to Judah in Hezekiah's time, but has a very direct bearing upon the returned exiles, who might well fear for their temple lest it should be destroyed by the sweeping conqueror. As for the arguments based upon style and language, and upon theological conception, they are so frail and tenuous as to need no consideration.

Dr. Briggs's zeal for his theory of Hebrew poetry leads him into several violations of sense and taste. For example, at the close of the brilliant 55th chapter of Isaiah, the Massoretic accentuation gives what we find in the common version, "Ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing." But we are told, in defiance of the parallelism, that this should be read:

> "And be led forth with peace to the mountains,
> And the hills will break forth before you," etc.

A note tells us that "the mountains are the mountains of Israel;" but this is not self-evident, is not sustained by any usage, and turns poetry into prose. So in Ps. 93, according to the Massoretes, we read, (R. V.):

> "Thy testimonies are very sure:
> Holiness becometh thine house,
> O Lord, forevermore."

But the new theory of rhythm gives us this awkward and obscure and tasteless result (p. 449):

> "Thy testimonies are very sure, at thy house.
> Holiness is becoming, Jahveh, for length of days."

The last line suggests what is a great disfiguration of the whole book, viz., the substitution of Jahveh for Jehovah throughout. The objections to this disagreeable pedantry are (1.) That no man knows or can know certainly what vowels were originally attached to the consonants of the incommunicable Divine name; (2.) that the modern transliteration makes an uncouth word, very hard for most persons to pronounce, and (3.) that Jehovah is now an accepted English word, as it has been for centuries, and that the full meaning of the Divine name can just as well be given in connection with this form as it can be with any other. To introduce Jahveh into a popular work is nothing but a miserable affectation of preciseness.

Occasionally the author's endeavor at fidelity of translation leads him to very strange utterances, as (p. 247) "For that day is greater than any like it;" (p. 264) "They will be enthroned on a throne for thee;" (p. 331) "Let not the well keep guard over me with its mouth;" (p. 323) "Saying, 'Roll on Jahveh; let him deliver him.'" In another place (p. 441) he changes the common version of a phrase in Zech. 8:22, to pray before (put in the Revised Version to intreat the favor of) into the words to court the face of; which is not only obscure but unwarrantable, for the literal meaning of the compound phrase is to stroke the face, i. e., to court, to entreat or to pray; and face, having been already expressed in the verb, should not appear separately. In the well-known passage (Isa. 52:15), "So shall he sprinkle many nations," the author adopts the modern rendering, startle instead of sprinkle, assigning as one reason for it that the entire piece does not touch upon the work of the priest or of purification, but deals with the sufferer as an offering for the redemption of His people. Yet admitting this, the blood of redemption was sprinkled upon and before the mercy-seat, and not only could but did represent the cleansing of guilt. Such sprinkling, therefore, is as much in place in the account of our Lord's vicarious suffering as it is anywhere else.

Dr. Briggs says that he sees no valid objection to the use of fiction in Scripture as pointing the lesson of fidelity to God, (p. 412), and then adds: "Indeed, we have an example of such fiction in Esther." If this were so, it would be an impossible task to explain the origin of the Jewish festival of Purim.

In the introductory chapters the author is justly severe upon those who confound prophecy with prediction and lay undue stress upon the correspondence of single, isolated particulars with what was merely the drapery of the inspired man's utterance; but it may well be questioned whether he does not err as widely on the other side, as when he affirms (p. 23) that the internal character of a prophecy is the only test of its genuineness, or insists (pp. 58, 59,) that a conditional element inheres necessarily in all prediction. His positions here seem to us alike to oppose the express words of Scripture (Isaiah 46:9–11; 48:3–6), and to unsettle the foundations of faith.

But notwithstanding all these shortcomings, the book is a very valuable one, showing large insight into the scope and connection of the older Scriptures, and furnishing an unusually clear and comprehensive view of the doctrine of the Messiah in all its relations. It should be added that the book is well printed and has two very satisfactory indexes.

T. W. Chambers.

The Land.

Mr Cyrus Elder has frequently given off-hand talks on political economy in the Cambria Scientific Institute of Johnston, Pa. The town is a centre of iron industry and he, therefore, has had before him a competent critical audience. He has discussed the labor problem, among other topics, and the platforms on which Socialists and labor organizations rest. His talks have been published in a book and are distinguished by marked independence and originality, while exhibiting a thorough acquaintance with the subjects handled. Among other topics the assertions of Mr. George and his sympathizers in regard to land were taken up, and points made which will bear examination. The American gives the following outline of the position of Mr. Elder on this matter:

"There are no original and indestructible powers of fertility in the soil." As to all its productive properties, land is made by labor. The earth is simply the raw material of a machine which man must fashion for use, and he must be perpetually remaking it. Agriculture is an endless struggle with nature, in which the original elements of fertility in the soil count for but little in helpfulness; they are more than counterbalanced by the adverse forces which go along with them—the formidable and numerous elements which must be encountered in subduing the richest soils, a labor which is nowhere fully accomplished. The history of the conquest of land in the United States discloses the largest courage, the hardest toil, and such thrift and vigor as have been displayed in no other industry. The same qualities put forth in any other work would have won much larger wealth; and nobody needs to be in want of land, or of anything else, who possesses and will use them.

"To talk about land as if it were a free gift of nature, which, like light and air, should belong to everybody and might be used by anybody, is nonsense. The cultivated land of the country has cost in labor, over and above its returns, more than it would sell for, if the labor is rated upon the basis of wages in other industries. The right of ownership of land in this country has, within our own observation and memory, its origin in labor expended upon the land, which gives as complete and just a title as there can be to anything."

It can be easily proved that land to the very large majority of its owners has been only a savings bank, and is worth to-day no more than has been expended on it. In a few instances, which are exceptions, a very limited area of land has been made especially valuable by its relation to the industry of the community, or to that of one or many nations. Mr. George's wild theory is simply an advocacy of wholesale robbery.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

Notes from Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA was founded in the days of William Penn and the Friends. They were benevolent and tolerant, and now Presbyterianism, Episcopacy and Baptist congregationalism flourish under their ancient ægis. It is said that the late Rev. Dr. George Washington Bethune, of blessed memory, went to Philadelphia with this inscription on his banner, "One new Dutch Reformed Church in Philadelphia every year." Fifty years have passed, and the Philadelphians have five Dutch churches instead of fifty.

Indeed, there was a time when it seemed as though there were to be four instead of five. Numbers of the brethren remember the Third Reformed Church of Philadelphia and the heroic labors of Synods, Particular and General, to ascertain and describe its existence. The highest judicatory finally named the gentlemen who should be considered the elders and deacons of that organization. But the civil courts of Pennsylvania have yet to decide upon the lawful corporation to whom payment of existing funds shall be made, if they are to be tranferred from the brother in whose custody they now are held, and as the law is proverbially Fabian in its delay, and the lawyers have existence to eke out, a decision may not soon be reached. Meanwhile, the saints of the non-ascertained and authorized Third Church do not forsake the assembling of themselves together, as the manner of some is, but meet from Sabbath to Sabbath to receive the sincere milk of the Word at the hands of various brethren in the ministry, some doctors in divinity, whom Providence providentially provides. A Sabbath-school, numbering over forty, meets upon the Lord's day between the morning and evening church services, and engages in interesting and spirited exercises. The attendance at Divine service has not been very large, but the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is administered at customary intervals, and the attendance then reaches forty.

It seems unfortunate that our Church polity does not meet such a case as this. The highest judicatory has recognized this church. Has the Church no further charge or duty in the matter? If a minister may be found adapted to the field should financial support stand in the way of the work? In an area around the church edifice, containing from thirty to forty thousand souls, only eight Protestant church organizations, including the Third Church, are at work. The neighborhood is good and growing. The one thing needful is the able and attractive preacher, the industrious and experienced pastor, the sagacious and soul-hungry missionary. Among the five hundred and odd ministers of the Reformed Church is there none to arise, saying, "Here am I, send for me?" or has no Synod, Classis, or Board power to say, "This is the man, receive him, and we will support him?"

Philadelphia is notably Presbyterian. Many Presbyterian ministers watch for the city as they that must give account. On Monday mornings they meet at the Publication Rooms and take counsel together. Last Monday we heard there the Rev. Dr. Fulton on the best methods of reviving and conducting the Ministerial Association. Many contributed their wisdom and wit to the hour, and at the conclusion the Rev. Dr. Erskine N. White, of New York, raised his mellifluous voice in regard to his new work of church erection.

Philadelphia possesses many objects of interest to the visitor which are not ministerial. The lofty and growing tower of the Public Buildings is a cynosure throughout the city; Wanamaker's emporium fascinates and bewilders the shopper; the cyclorama of Gettysburg thrills the spectator with reminiscences of the great conflict; the cable cars on Market street prove the practical utility of such an enterprise; and the University of Pennsylvania rewards the academic taste with spacious grounds, commodious buildings, a library of fifty thousand volumes and a specialty of as many pamphlets, and a chapel with five stained-glass windows, and a handsome memorial shrine to the graduates who fell in the Civil War, bearing the celebrated Greek inscription:

> "Stranger, tell the Lacedæmonians,
> That here we lie, obedient to their laws!"

An hour's ride from Philadelphia, on the banks of the Delaware, is Trenton, the capital of New Jersey, where the visitor may see the façade of the State House rising from the ashes of conflagration, and the State prison with its thousand stripped inmates. The overseer has made an excellent suggestion, that first adult offenders should be sent upon conviction of a State-prison offence not to the prison, but to a penitentiary or reformatory, now much needed, thus avoiding damaging contact with veterans in crime, and the stigma of having been in the State prison.

Sabbath-School Christmas Offerings.

THIS is the second year these offerings have been sought for the general work of our Church Building Fund. Will the pastors, officers, teachers and friends of our Reformed Church Sunday-schools please plan to make the appeals successful that are sent to each of these schools for a similar Christmas offering this year? The needs of that Fund are undisputed and pressing. The excellence and durability of its work are manifest. Church and parsonage buildings endure. The habit of making as well as receiving Christmas gifts is a good one for the children. A goodly number of schools responded to the appeal last year. Shall not all do it this year? Cannot your school do it?

N. D. WILLIAMSON, W. M. S. S.

DECEMBER 4th, 1886.

....THE CLASSIS OF IOWA at a special meeting dismissed the Rev. L. Dykstra to the Classis of Albany, and adopted a minute expressing its "heartfelt regret in parting with an esteemed and useful brother, who has labored so successfully in the upbuilding of the Church of Newkirk and served the Classis so acceptably as Stated Clerk." The Rev. Jas. F. Zwemer was elected Stated Clerk pro tem. Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. J. Smit as pastor of the Third Church of Pella. S. C.

....HOLMDEL, N. J.—Last Wednesday evening the parsonage was occupied as it has not been for years by the attendance upon the donation party to the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Riley. Nearly the entire congregation was present. The gifts have been equalled only once before on a similar occasion. One reason for the large gathering was that many feared that it might be the last opportunity to express their love and regard for one who has ministered to them for forty-seven years, as a report was current that Dr. Riley thinks of retiring from the pastorate in the spring. A spirit of high regard and deep affection for the venerable pastor and his wife was manifested at this gathering.

....ROTTERDAM, KANSAS.—The First Church, Rev. John Hoekje, pastor, expect to dedicate their new church edifice on the 19th inst., free from debt. It is a neat and convenient church home in the Gothic style of architecture. W.

....RECENT ADDITIONS.—The Church of Nyack, N. Y., on Sabbath, Dec. 5th, received 16 members on confession and 5 by letter....On the same day at Hackensack, N. J., 8 young persons, all from the Sabbath-school, were received into the fellowship of the church. It was a day of great joy to all. There is a deep religious interest among the young people of the congregation. The young peoples' prayer-meeting enjoys a full attendance and many are seeking the way of life.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—The American Reformed Church of Chicago is making good progress. They propose to rent the church on the corner of Paulina and Harrison streets. For the rent they have already secured the sum of $500....The Church of Detroit, Mich., have engaged the services of Rev. Dr. Waldron, an emeritus pastor, who preaches in English every Sunday evening for this Holland church.... The Ladies' Missionary Society of the First Church of Kalamazoo contributed the last month again $48.50 for the Board of Foreign Missions....During the past six months the churches in the Particular Synod of Chicago contributed $2,310.04 for foreign missions; 44 churches gave this sum; the other 107 churches at the West will make their offerings during the coming six months....Rev. W. I. Chamberlain preached Sunday, the 5th inst., at Holland Mich., in the morning in Hope Church, in the evening for a union meeting of all the Reformed churches of the city. At both services the audience was large, the interest good....The Church in Emmons County, Dakota, is the furthest church Northwest; it is, perhaps, about 50 miles southeast of Bismarck, and about 15 miles due north of the one in Campbell County. The church numbers nearly 50 families. They worship in a little school-house, which is by far too small. With the aid of $700 they could build a house which would serve their purpose for a number of years....The church at Philadelphia, Phillips Co., Kansas, has received as pastor, Rev. D. Scholten, who three years ago commenced his theological studies at New Brunswick. At that time his home was at Alton, Iowa. When theology was reëstablished at Hope College, he finished his theological studies at Holland, Mich., last spring and accepted the call to Kansas. He found a church there of about 30 families. They have built a small house in which they meet for worship, and also a parsonage for their pastor. This church is nearly at the west end of the State, not far from Colorado.

Abraham J. Beekman.

THE death of Abraham J. Beekman at the house of his son-in-law in Babylon, Long Island, on the seventh of this month, removes one known and honored through our whole Church. He was the oldest male member of the historic First Church of Brooklyn, having been connected with it since 1828. He had been its treasurer, Sunday-school superintendent, and a deacon and elder in its consistory, and during this last year published a brief but comprehensive historical account of the corporation from its organization in 1660. In the Church at large he was often a member of its various bodies and his counsel and active interest won him the esteem of all his brethren. In his business life he gained the same confidence, as he carried into his daily work the unswerving honesty, accuracy and activity which were principles of his life. His aim was not to accumulate property, but to do his duty as in God's sight. And his reward came through the trust and affection which were always granted him amid large circles of friends. For a few years past he had felt the coming on of old age, but his cheerful spirits kept him in apparent strength till the last fortnight of his life on earth, when a sudden chill was followed by a fatal attack of pneumonia.

There are but few men left like Mr. Beekman, coming down from the first quarter of the century, and holding fast all the details of the marvellous growth of New York and Brooklyn. He loved to recall the simpler days of the two great cities and to give the career of some of their noted families. The close associates of his youth and manhood had nearly all passed away before him, but he cherished their memory with warm feeling. The church of his fathers was especially close to his heart, and he longed and prayed for it day by day. Such lives as his are the choice treasures which those left on earth should rejoice to hold long in memory. At the funeral services on Friday, which were conducted by the Rev. Dr. W. R. Duryee, of Jersey City, a warm personal friend, the description of the blessedness of the godly man as depicted in the first psalm was shown to be especially applicable to Mr. Beekman. The tender feeling shown on the occasion by the circle of business associates and old friends proved that he who had passed away had bound closely many hearts to himself, and that God had given the truest success to the simple, pure and earnest life of his servant. ....CHRISTMAS BOOKS in considerable variety will be found on the tables of the store of the Board of Publication, 34 Vesey street, N. Y. Everybody knows or ought to know by this time that Mr. Richard Brinkerhoff, the Agent, will promptly fill orders or procure books which may not be in the stock of the Board.

....At a special meeting of the CLASSIS OF PARAMUS, held December 13th, 1886, the pastoral relation between the Rev. V. B. Carroll and the Church of Warwick, N. Y., was dissolved, to take effect January 1st, 1887. A call from the Church of Centerville, N. J., upon the Rev. Anson DuBois, D.D., was approved.

....PERSONAL.—The Rev. P. T. Pockman, of Greenville, N. J., has accepted the call from the First Church of New Brunswick, N. J....It is reported that the Rev. Dr. E. S. Porter is seriously sick at his home at Claverack, N. Y., and that his family have grave apprehensions as to his recovery....The Rev. W. W. Knox, pastor of the First Church of Bayonne, N. J., preached his fifth anniversary sermon on Sunday, December 5th....The Rev. A. McWilliams, pastor of the East Millstone Church, received from his people a purse of $205 and provision valued at $40.

....At the meeting of the PASTORS' ASSOCIATION last Monday Rev. Dr. Chambers read a paper entitled "Classification of the Parables." Next week a paper will be given by the Rev. Dr. Waters; subject, "The Blood Covenant."

....PLAINFIELD, N. J.—The corner-stone of a new Reformed church (German) was laid in Craig place, Sunday, December 5th. A box, containing documents relating to the church, with copies of the city papers, was placed in the stone. The snowstorm at the time was so severe that the exercises were abridged by the omission of the addresses which were to have been given by the Rev. Mr. Raymond and the pastor, Rev. Mr. Koechli.

The Union Theological Seminary.

THE semi-centennial of this institution was celebrated on Tuesday, December 7th. The public services took place in the beautiful and capacious Adam's Chapel, at the new seminary building on Park avenue, between 69th and 70th streets, commencing with the Lord's Prayer by President Hitchcock, all audibly joining with him. The hymn, "Christ is made the sure foundation," was sung. The chief feature of the occasion was the historical address by Professor George L. Prentiss, D.D. Introductory to it, however, was the reading of Scripture and a prayer by the Rev. Dr. Vincent of the "Church of the Covenant," of this city, and some short, felicitous remarks by the President, in which he gracefully alluded to the presence of several distinguished gentlemen at his right and left, one of whom was Charles Butler, Esq., a venerable friend and the senior Trustee of the Seminary, also Chief Justice Daly, of this city, a son of Mr. James Brown, who was its most munificent benefactor, and others.

The address of Professor Prentiss, comprehending a rich résumé of facts and reminiscences, related to the founders and early friends of the institution, both ministers and laymen, and to the struggles through which it had passed, was well worthy of this commemorative gathering and of his reputation as an eloquent and impressive speaker. He was alike happy in diction and delivery. A large number of the alumni were present, and representatives from other institutions.

A bountiful collation was afterward served, of which all present were invited to partake, and at which several speeches from prominent guests were made.

The benediction was pronounced, and friends took leave of each other, feeling that a very rare and memorable re-union had been enjoyed. W. H.

...WARWICK, N. Y.—The Rev. V. B. Carroll, pastor for ten years of the church at this place, preached his farewell sermon on Sunday evening, December 5th. During the period of his pastorate 112 persons have been added to the church, of whom 56 were by profession of their faith. There have been contributed for benevolence $5,163.87. His withdrawal from the parish is a matter of deep regret to many of the congregation, and as evidences of their good will, Brother Carroll has received a purse of $200, and been given the free use of the parsonage until needed by his successor.

American Bible Society.

THE Board of Managers met at the Bible House, on Thursday, December 2d, 1886, William H. Crosby, Esq., Vice-President, in the chair. Grants of books were made for benevolent distribution at home and abroad, of the aggregate value of about $3,500. Funds to the amount of $548 were also appropriated for Bible work in India.

Among foreign letters presented were some of special interest from Miss West of Marash, in behalf of the Central Turkey Mission; Dr. J. W. Scudder of Arcot, reporting Bible distribution by the Mission of the Reformed Church; Rev. H. Nuelsen of Bremen, concerning work in Germany; Rev. J. M. Erikson of Stockholm, Mr. A. H. Erwin of Baranquilla, and Mr. Osuna of Caracas; Rev. J. P. Dardier of Geneva, announcing his proposed visit to the United States; and various Agents in foreign lands. Mr. Milne reported the remarkable sale in Peru in four weeks of more than 1,600 volumes of Scripture.

The receipts in November from all sources were $33,887.33; of which amount $17,274.79 were for books sold and on purchase account. Issues from the Bible House during the month of November, 84,622 volumes, issues since April 1st, 657,204 volumes.

The General Outlook.

....Of the Monday morning meeting of Congregational Ministers of Chicago, the Advance of the 9th reports:

"The Ministers' Union, last Monday, discussed at length the Des Moines Resolution and the feasibility of referring difficult theological questions to councils. The brethren were not agreed as to the meaning of the resolution or the practicability of councils in such cases. It came out in the discussion that the authors of the resolution in question put opposite constructions on it. One intended that the Prudential Committee should consider the question and report; and the other meant that they should not only consider but should also try the experiment. It was urged on one side that councils were wholly practicable in such cases; that that was the only method of deciding one's theological fitness to preach as a missionary at any time in his history; that the Prudential Committee should not pass upon such questions. Others were equally positive that councils for difficult cases were wholly impracticable; that a council would increase rather than diminish the difficulty. Churches would take sides, and every man with a 'new departure' would receive an unenviable notoriety. It was noticeable that no one had a good word for the 'new departure.' The most strenuous advocates of councils or of Mr. Hume were careful to disclaim any sympathy with the theory of a future probation as unscriptural, 'perversive, divisive and dangerous'—a theory that strikes not only at eschatology but at the atonement, at the doctrine of sin and the inspiration of the Scriptures."

....The western correspondent of the Congregationalist writes as follows of a great work in Chicago:

The new "Armour Mission," destined to grow into one of the signal institutions of Chicago, is to be opened for use next Sunday, Dec. 5. The building is one which Dr. Scudder declares to be the finest for its purpose he has ever seen in any part of the world. It is situated on Thirty-third and Dearborn streets, is 85x185 feet, and three stories in height. The main audience room has seats for 1,100. Admirable room for almost all manner of utilities are provided, and arranged with the utmost ingenuity and skill. The design is to have a building that shall be in use day and night, seven days in the week. Altogether it appears to be a capital instance of a genuine philanthrophy, favored with abundant means, seeing clear and thinking straight in full view of the exact needs of the place. The germ of the institution was the Plymouth Mission, started about twelve years ago by Dr. J. H Hollister and others of the Plymouth Church. As the original mission grew and proved its value, Mr. J. F. Armour, who has since died, also a member of Plymouth Church, aided it, and at his death directed that $100,000 of his estate should be given to the development of the mission. His brother, Philip Armour—known the world over by his enormous meat packing establishment, the products of which go toward feeding the hungry in nearly all lands—has taken the matter up, after his own large and sagacious way, intending to devote to the institution and its comprehensive enterprise a half million dollars, if need be.

An entire block, including nearly five acres, is set apart for its support. The plan is to cover the land with houses, built plainly but attractively, after the most approved style, to be let at moderate prices, but only to a good class of people; the rental all to go toward the support and development of the mission. The pastor of the mission is Rev. J. D. McCord. The Sunday school in the new rooms will begin with about six hundred. The preaching services are held Sunday evening. The large teaching force in the Sunday school is mainly from the Plymouth Church, with Dr. Hollister and Mr. E. B. Smith as superintendents, Dr. H. M. Scudder, Jr., a young physician of promise and with the inherited missionary impulse, has charge of the free medical dispensary. There is to be a day nursery, where mothers at work may leave their babies or small children. The reading-room, on the first floor, will be made as attractive as possible. Provision is to be made for frequent series of popular and instructive evening lectures, somewhat similar to those which Mr. C. E. Bolton conducted so successfully in the People's Tabernacle in Cleveland. Another highly important part of this great mission is to be its system of kindergarten, and industrial schools. Both Mr. and Mrs. Armour take a deep interest in the enterprise. They have wisely chosen the fittest man to counsel with and to help in carrying into effect their grand undertaking. The Armour Mission has no formal organic connection with Plymouth Church, where Mr. Armour is a constant attendant, but the conduct of the various forms of activity going on in it are mainly in charge of men and women from this church. Some features of the undertaking are experimental, and will be watched with peculiar interest.

....Prof. Sir Monier Williams, of Oxford, declares that Buddhism has entirely died out in India proper, the place of its origin and is rapidly dying out in other Asiatic countries. He thinks the devotees of the religion do not number over 100,000,000 at the present time, and that the exaggerated ideas with regard to the population, together with the forgetfulness of the millions who worship no one but their own ancestors, account for the idea that the Confucianists are so numerous. His own opinion is that in point of numbers Christianity stands at the head of all the religions of the world. The order following Christianity he believes to be, Hindooism (including Brahmanism, Jainism, demon and fetish worships), Confucianism, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Taoism, Judaism and Zoroastrianism.

A merchant at Leipsig, who made his clerks write business letters on Sunday behind closed doors, was sentenced to two weeks' imprisonment for violation of the Sunday law, Persons who induce minors to visit public ball-rooms and the keepers of such places who admit minors, are liable to prosecution and heavy fine.

....Thirty-thousand dollars have been raised toward a Young Men's Christian Association building in Minneapolis. A house has been donated for a News Boy's Home in the same city.

....A few days ago there died in Boston an eccentric man by the name of E. Price Greenleaf. He was a miser and accumulated his large property by the most miserable mode of life. For fifty years he had been a resident of the town of Quincy. He lived the live of an anchorite. With hundreds of thousands of dollars behind the stout granite walls of the safe deposite company, he would deny himself nearly all the privileges and most of the necessities of life. He lived in a little wooden house and the only companion he had was an old and trusted servant. What Mr. Greenleaf ate he raised himself in the little garden hard by. He positively refused to be companionable to his neighbors. Since 1879 he spent his winters at No. 72 Waltham st., where he died at the age of ninety-six. He had nearly all his life been hale, hearty and strong. For the last two years he had been failing rapidly and he died of old age. By his death a remarkable family became extinct. He was the last remnant of a union between the Greenleaf and Price families. They were Boston bred people on both sides of the house. Many members of both families have lived almost to the century mark.

Mr. Greenleaf's property is worth between $400,000 and $500,000. The bulk of this sum will be turned over to Harvard College.

....On Saturday last, in the Synagogue at the corner of Broad and Mount Vernon streets, Philadelphia, Mr. Morris Jastrow, who was assistant to his father, the Rabbi of the Synagogue, publicly declared that he could serve the congregation no longer, as he was at a loss what to teach and how to teach. "Judaism" did not stand any longer for a definite set of ideas. "There is an awful confusion," he said, "with reference to the meaning of the term Judaisn." In this uncertainty he must decline to set forth any clear and authoritative declaration of faith. He sternly advocated consistency and candor. "If," said he, "we interpret the terms 'revelation,' 'divine authority,' 'divine mission,' and the like, in a sense which differs essentially from that in which they have hitherto been understood, we must distinctly say so." In which he was clearly right. Interpreting away established doctrine savors of dishonesty. He could not be Jesuitical, therefore he ceased to speak in the Synagogue. We believed that Mr. Jastrow is the young scholar who was lately elected lecturer on the Assyrian language in the Uuiversity of Pennsylvania.—The Presbyterian.

Psalm CXXX.

BY E. A. COLLIER, D.D.

OUT of the depths I call to Thee,
Hear Thou my voice, O Lord, most high,
And let Thine ear attentive be
Unto my earnest, suppliant cry.

If Thou, Jehovah, mark our sins,
Who, Lord, shall stand before Thy face;
But holier, tenderer fear begins
As comes Thine all-forgiving grace.

I wait for Thee; my soul doth wait;
I rest my hope upon Thy Word.
None watch for dawn at morning's gate
As waits my soul for Thee, O Lord.

O Israel! in thy Lord confide,
For with the Lord is mercy free;
Riches of grace in Him abide,
He from all sin redeemeth thee.

Bertha's Trust.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

Part First.

"I GUESS we won't have anything for Christmas this year, papa, will we?" exclaimed little Bertha, despondingly, as she stood leaning her chin on her crossed arms very much in the manner of the little cherub at the foot of the Sistine Madonna. She was looking out of the window of the poor room in which her father sat at his cobbler's bench mending a pair of shoes. He did not answer until she repeated the words, turning to the corner in which he sat at work.

"Not much, Berthey," he replied, "but the Lord knows best; we can trust Him," and then he adjusted his spectacles and continued his work.

The child sighed. She was of an age at which Christmas gifts and dinners were among life's best blessings. Her ideas of a fine dinner, however, differed from yours or mine. "If we could buy a fresh pork chop for you and me, papa, what a nice time we'd have!"

There was no reply, and Bertha went to the window again. It commanded a view of distant hills, half hidden just then with the blue, misty veil of a late Indian summer, embroidered with the green of pine and hemlock. The house in which these two lived stood on a turn of the road, just within the shelter of the woods which here for a little distance hemmed the roadside.

The poverty of the cobbler and his child differed from equal indigence in a great city because, instead of squalor and filth, reeking gutters and the society of degraded men and women, they lived in the beauty of woods and hills, blue sky above and green slopes of meadows on which cattle grazed peacefully, and birds sang all through the quiet summer day. The refining influence of such surroundings may have had their moulding effect upon this gentle little child with the large brown eyes and pleasant manners, sensitive and skrinking from notice, but not stupid or weak.

Her father, notwithstanding his serious, reticent manner toward her, just idolized this, the one child left of a large family, who had followed their delicate, sickly mother to early graves in the village churchyard—the village not far distant, although hidden from the window at which the child stood by a knoll of rising ground to the eastward.

"When I get these shoes finished, Berthey, you may take them up to Mr. Weaver's. They belong to his waiter man, Simmons. You must be sure to ask for him and put them in his own hands, and mebbe he'll give you the money. If he does, then we may think about the pork chops."

But Bertha could not help thinking about the pork chops as she sat near her father's work-bench watching him, and the possibility of a hot dinner loomed up enticingly before her as she began to arrange what she should say to Mr. Weaver's tall English waiter when she handed him the shoes.

Mr. Weaver was the rich man of the place, made so by successful speculation. He did not leave his country seat in this his native town until after the holidays. The family entertained a great deal of company, and the house all through the late autumn had been a round of gayety.

Bertha arrayed herself in the best that her scanty wardrobe afforded, and when the shoes were finished she took them and started out to return them to their owner. Her father's words came back to her mind. She had so little companionship of those of her own age that she was accustomed to talk to the animate and even to the inanimate things around her. Her eye caught the distant spire of the village church, and she exclaimed: "Father always says the Lord knows best; he always says we can trust Him! The minister in the church yonder thinks so too! Well, I wish I could think so, but somehow when I'm hungry I don't feel that way. When I have a nice dinner and feel well and happy, then I think, myself, that the Lord knows best and I can trust Him then. Father always trusts the Lord. But, somehow—" here she hesitated a little, as if she could scarcely venture to say what she really thought, "I—I—it—it—doesn't always seem as if the Lord knows best! Now does it?" looking at the gilt vane on the spire which had just then caught the rays of the declining sun and sparkled as if, in reflecting a glory above and beyond itself, it had reproved her want of faith. At least she felt it so, and trudged on in silence until she reached Mr. Weaver's house.

She went to the kitchen door and the cook, seeing her pass, tapped on the window with a fork and bade her come in.

In reply to Bertha's inquiry for Simmons, she replied: "Sure an' he's busy. There's lots of company. It's Miss Josephine's birthday, it is. The young ladies is goin' to have tablers." This was Bridget's pronunciation of tableaux. But in whatever way pronounced, the word would have conveyed no meaning to the mind of the child, who knew nothing of the amusements of the gay world.

"Ye needn't wait. I'll give Simmons the bundle."

But Bertha thought of the dinner dependent upon the money paid for the shoes, and felt reluctant to give them up without it. Unfortunately the cook misconstrued her reluctance. "The suspicious craythur," thought Bridget, "she thinks I'll kape the money meself."

The cook turned toward her pies in the oven, saying as she did so, "Ye'll find Simmons in the pantry; open that door."

Bertha did as she was told. Simmons was not there, but she saw him go to the room beyond, and she followed. It was the dining-room. In her narrow experience of life Bertha had never seen a handsomely set table before. She stood with dilated eyes, gazing at the flowers, the fruit, the crystal-clear glass, the beautiful china and the exquisite table linen. It was a Paradise of which she had never dreamed! So absorbed was she that she neither saw Simmons, who was motioning her to go away, nor the lady of the house, who entered the dining-room at the same time.

"Where does this child come from?" she inquired.

Simmons muttered something about the "Himpertinence of cobblers and such," and was about to shove the child rudely back into the kitchen. The lady interfered. As if a sudden thought had come into her mind she exclaimed, "This child is just what the girls are wishing for!"

"Josephine!" going into the next room, from which proceeded much laughter and the merry voices of young people, "Josephine! why won't this child do? She would make a nice little beggar girl!"

Miss Josephine came out to inspect this small sample of a beggar girl. The words caught the quick ear of the child and she shrank back.

"Just the very thing! and that attitude is perfect. She is a born actress!"

Yes, so far as acting is true to nature. The sensitive soul of the child revolted at the term which had been applied to her, and she blushed deeply. This made her all the more attractive, and she seemed the very impersonation of what they wanted her to represent.

The state of the case was this. The little miss who was to represent "poverty" in contrast to some other, who represented "riches," had been prevented from coming to the entertainment, Scarlet fever had made its appearance among the children of the family, so that even the costume prepared for the occasion could not be taken from her house. All this at the last moment, when a dress and a substitute would require time and preparation.

That there could be any possible objection on the part of the child never occurred to Miss Josephine, and when the child sobbed, she attributed to fright, that which really arose from the sensitive shrinking of Bertha from being called a beggar.

"I only want the money for papa's work, and do please let me go home. I ain't no beggar girl!" cried the little one, now really frightened, as the young actors and actresses in their fancy costumes came from the rehearsal and crowded around her. There were kings in gilt paper crowns and canton flannel ermine. There were knights in silver paper armor and tin battle axes and spears; fine ladies; maids of honor to Queen Elizabeth and Queen Ann; King David holding his harp by a broken string, and King Saul whose crown was awry; court jesters and fools with bells, monks and nuns, all come to judge if she "would do" and they all decided that she would; but what it was all about was such a mystery to poor little Bertha that no one could have been more surprised than she was, if all their dreams of fairy land had suddenly proved true.

A coarse boy in armor, representing a knight, suggested that the unwillingness of the child was a bid for money, but the young girls present resented that. "She is only a little frightened. Step back girls. Let me speak with her," exclaimed a fairy queen.

She knew the child and understood her better than the rest. There are even among children those who can read character and understand motives; such always rule among their fellows. This young girl in her fairy queen trappings took Bertha aside and explained just what was wanted and placed it as a favor she might do for them. To this followed a suggestion that it would also result in some pecuniary relief to her father, who had always worked so hard for her. So delicately worded, the case so pleasantly presented, Bertha was but too happy to comply, and the change wrought by the whispering of the fairy queen seemed as magical as if wrought by her wand. Bertha mounted the platform for rehearsal with beaming eyes and glowing cheeks, and a more graceful and obedient little beggar girl could nowhere have been found. The only fault suggested by the admiring and criticizing audience proved to be that she was "too clean and whole." As to being otherwise than clean, none would listen to that, but, "tattered? Well, she ought to have some rents here and there!"

Whole and clean poverty did not seem to be representative poverty. While she stood in the attitude arranged for her, Miss Josephine tore a long rent in the child's dress. Bertha saw it with dismay. It was her very best dress. This was a strange contrast to the care with which she had been taught to preserve her clothing. Was the world being turned upside down? Was it better to be careless and ragged?

The rehearsal being concluded, the child was allowed to return home to tell her father what they required of her and to return later in the evening to take her place in the entertainment.

The fairy queen, who was one of the younger daughters of the house, followed Bertha to the kitchen to slip some cake and fruit into her pocket and to whisper that she need not mind the torn dress, as she herself would replace it with a nice one of her own, that would fit her exactly. Bertha wondered if it was made of gauze and spangles like the one she had on, and in that case, if her father would let her go to church in it!

The cook was greatly excited by the impression Bertha had made on the company. "The loikes of her in the parlor! There's me sister's little Mary Ann, as foine a child as ever lived, I'd uve sent for her if I'd known as they wanted a little girrul. She hez a red velvet gown like the stuff on the libry chairs. She could a worn that sure, instead of a torn calico!"

As Bertha skipped merrily on her way homeward she exclaimed, looking up at a crow cawing on a tree-top on the edge of the words: "You and I, Mr. Crow, have to depend upon the Lord for what we get to eat! But we can trust Him. He provides for us. He provides for you and for me and for the sparrows, Mr. Crow!"

The crow flew away and the child ran swiftly home.

Save the Boys and Girls.

BY THE REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS.

SUCH a case as this is frequently met in these days. A pastor inquires in a home in regard to the young men: "Do they attend church?" "No." "Do they go to Sabbath-school?" "They used to, but felt as if they were getting too old for Sabbath-school and so they left, and as they are not used to going to church, it is hard to get them to go." Unless we cultivate in our classes and in our homes the habit of attending church during the period while the young people are in the Sabbath-school, it is to be expected that whenever they feel too old to continue in the school, or when for any cause they are led to leave it, they will not attend church in its place, not having been led into this important habit. There is no more important work for a Sabbath-school teacher, except the conversion of souls, than to secure their attendance at church. There will be no lack of welcome to boys and girls, or young men and young ladies, who may be too poor to rent a sitting at first.

Why do you not bring your children to church? Is it because it will require you to rise a few moments earlier to get them ready? Then you are putting personal indulgence in needless sleep against the interests of a soul committed to your keeping. Is it that you feel the children will cause you a little care at church? Surely it is worth a little trouble for one who is already saved and bound for heaven to help another into the same glorious way. Better that a mother and Christians in the surrounding pews should have a few moments of disturbance, if necessary, for a few Sundays, than that a child and a mother should be kept away from the privileges of the church. Let everyone ask himself the question: "Am I doing all that I can at home and in the Sabbath-school to cultivate a church-going habit in the little ones under my influence?"

The story of Christ's boyhood, in which we are told that His mother hunted for Him as a lost boy, reminds us of the terrible anxiety that many a mother has felt when the cry, "Boy lost," has been shouted through the town by the crier, and it was her own boy that was lost.

A little son of Dr. T. M. Eddy was lost one day in Chicago. Dr. and Mrs. Eddy were met on the street by their oldest son, saying, "Little Ramie is lost; we cannot find him anywhere." With terrible anxiety they hastened home, but there had come no tidings. Word was sent to the police, and, as the news spread, friends of the family gathered to help in the search and sympathize. Patrol parties were sent in all directions to look for the lost boy. Hours passed and still no tidings. Every street and alley in the vicinity was searched; but all in vain. A crier was procured, who cried through the streets, "Lost Boy," giving a description of the little wanderer. The parents were in an agony of suspense. The cold night came on, and they did not know but he might be frozen to death in the streets or crushed under the wheels of the street-cars. The night wore on; still no tidings. It seemed as if the morning would never come. At last it dawned. Notice had been sent to the morning papers, and friends came to sympathize, but could do nothing. The sight of the little playthings about the house brought new agony to the parents. At last a German came, saying that if the description given in the papers was the description of their boy, he was safe. Unable to wait for the man's return, they took a carriage and went to the place where they thought he had directed them, but found no child. Back to their home; but he had not come. Their anxiety was too deep for words. At last they saw some one coming in the distance. Nearer and nearer he came, until the overjoyed parents recognized their lost child.

How world-wide has been the interest in the lost boy, Charlie Ross. What if it had been your Charlie? How much more terrible will be the cry, if after years of neglect on your part your boy should die unprepared, and you shall cry over him, "Soul lost!"

A friend of mine in Chicago, whose wife and two children went to England to visit, heard that the ship on which they had sailed had been wrecked. He soon received a dispatch from his wife, "Saved alone." That dispatch told him that his boys were lost—their bodily life had perished,—but there was one great consolation in his sorrow, that they were Christian boys, and their souls were not lost. Will you, O Christian father or mother or teacher, be content to reach the heavenly shore after the voyage of life and have no better message to send back than "Saved alone?" Will you not rather work and pray that you may be able to say, in God's presence, "Here am I, and the children that Thou hast given me."

You have heard, perhaps, of the two children stolen by the Indians in early childhood, who were restored to their parents long years afterwards when they had forgotten that they had ever lived among the whites, by the power of early impressions, in this way: A dozen or more such stolen children, who had grown into boyhood and girlhood, were recovered from the Indians, and this mother came to find her two lost children; but none of them recognized her, nor could she recognize them by any outward appearance. At length she tried the effect of their old cradle song, and had sung but a few lines when two children ran out from the line, crying, "Mother! Mother!" So let us remember that the power of early religious training, even if it does not result in conversion in childhood, will often call the souls of our loved ones, like that mother's song, at some future hour of thoughtfulness, out of the ranks of sin into fellowship with God. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old [if not when he is young] he will not depart from it."

The story of Christ also reminds us of securing obedience at home, not so much for our own sakes as for the sake of the children. No man is fit to command who has not first learned to obey. How ridiculous aspirants for the Presidency seem when in Congress, in some moment of excitement, they show that they cannot even rule themselves, and most flagrantly violate the laws.

A shopkeeper put into his window the notice, "Wanted a boy to run errands." Next morning his shop was full, and it was impossible to make a choice. He sent them all home, and tried to think of some way to find the best of them. Next day he advertised in the paper, "Wanted a boy to run errands, who minds his mother." Only two in all the large city applied. Such a fact is sadly suggestive. If obedience is not taught at home, which is the very school in which to teach obedience, as great a wrong is committed as if a day-school teacher failed to teach a pupil to read and write. The parent who does not require prompt and implicit obedience at home prepares a son or daughter for violation of the laws of society and of the State and of God. Unless one learns in childhood the habit of obedience, he will be very likely to disobey other laws when he goes out from the home. The child taught to obey home authority is far more likely afterwards to yield glad and full obedience to the laws of God. They who love, trust and obey at home, find it easy to love, trust and obey the heavenly Father.

Overmuch Righteousness.

BY THE REV. MAURICE G. HANSEN.

THE wisest king of Israel denounced it, not in an isolated injunction, but in the course of an elaborate argument which begins at the first verse of the sixth chapter of the Book of Ecclesiastes, and is carried forward to the fifteenth verse of the eighth chapter. The monarch, dealing with the intricate theme of a Divine Providence, had made an attempt to explain its inequalities by applying a threefold principle. In the first place, happiness is better than the accumulation of temporal wealth; next, there is a possible, but not an essential nor a frequent connection between them, since the former is particularly the gift of God; and thirdly, the bestowal of this gift is not arbitrary, but in accordance with a beautifully arranged plan. The application of this threefold principle involves the recognition of a double demand, the elaborate statement of which constitutes the course of reasoning contained within the limits of the chapters and verses that have been mentioned—a just estimate must be formed of men's characters; also, the fact must not be ignored that the very idea of a Divine government implies that, sooner or later, equitable justice will be administered.

In the consideration of the apparent inequalities of Divine Providence, a compliance with the first of these requisites results in the discovery that often one who seems to be suffering unjustly, really is not as good as he seems to be. A certain kind of righteousness is liable to become an object of suspicion because of the extreme extent to which it is carried. Its elongation exposes its spuriousness. The "overmuch" establishes its real character. At least three of the forms which it assumes serve to illustrate this point. They are Phariseeïsm, as a performance of multiplied acts of will-worship; sanctimoniousness in aspect and demeanor; and, censoriousness. In respect to each of these forms it is the quantity which reveals the quality. The excessiveness is the dead fly in the seemingly valuable jar of ointment, which causes it to emit a disagreeable odor to those who, for purposes of examination, apply the nostrils.

A representative of this Phariseeïsm was he who, before his wonderful experience on the road from Jerusalem to Damascus, "lived after the most straightest sect of his religion." It is hardly possible to imagine what this "lived" purported in respect to abstention from extortion, injustice and adultery, and also in respect to frequent painful fasting and the exhibition of an astonishing generosity in behalf of ecclesiastical interests. What refinement in practice it suggests upon the demands of the law, exacting though these may be. Surely the character of a person who thus abounds in righteousness, both as regards the negative and the positive sides of it, may well be compared to a diamond of the first water. But in commerce there are imitation diamonds as well, recognized only by the skilful lapidary. If, properly, virtue should never fail of its reward, what shall be thought of the justice of a Providence that brings to grief a saint like the Pharisee in the temple? Even the very abundance of the righteousness which is the boast of such, and which is to be "exceeded," not in the line of its own continuity, for that would be impossible, but in one that deviates from it, shows its imperfection. Behind it all lies ignorance, or disregard of the fact that the fairest practice without the inward spirituality of which it should be the efflorescence, is, not worthless as some say, for it has its value, but fatally defective. Judged by the highest conceivable standard of right, the most attractive course of Pharisaic righteousness is sadly wanting. The self-glorying of the humble publican's proud fellow-worshipper is the natural outcome of such ignorance concerning the true character of a righteousness which is not sufficient to justify even from the evidences of God's displeasure made manifest in this life.

Sanctimoniousness, which is another form of overmuch righteousness, needs only to be mentioned in order to arouse in every ingenuous mind a feeling of disgust and contempt. How much more, then, the exhibition of it repels, for where it shows itself it cannot be mistaken beneath the pretense of devotion which it puts forth. Novelists like Dickens and Thackeray loved to expose the masked individual as he boldly moves about within the concentric circles of social life. Bringing to the light of day the hideous deformities of such a character, they have done not a little in holding it up to the merited scorn of all mankind. There are not a few who, unskilful in detecting the pinchbeck beneath the golden hue, are deceived, for the sanctimonious claim to be possessed of the highest kind of life; they profess godliness; they cry, Lord, Lord. These things impose upon those who have not the opportunity of knowing that instead of life death has dominion over such; that they deny the power of godliness; that they keep not the Divine commandments; that, while religion is carried outwardly on the countenance, the heart is very far from God.

Besides this sanctimoniousness which is hypocrisy, there is a species of it which has its root in conscientiousness; only it is a conscientiousness misdirected through a real inherent weakness, or deteriorated into a cynical austerity. To the unhappy victims of this spiritual disease a hearty laugh is a discordant sound, and a game of lawn-tennis a sinful pleasure. Nevertheless, the very antipathy which such people display toward every relaxation from that which is grave and serious, produces upon some the impression that they must be extraordinarily good. There is One, however, who without the shadow of an error of judgment, searches the heart and tries the reins. The calamities by means of which He lays bare the hypocrisy of the sanctimonious fraud, and leads the sanctimonious cynic to a wholesome introspection of himself, are not the evidences of the disregard of Providence in reference to the reward due to the virtuous, but the tokens of a Divine disapproval toward an "overmuch righteousness," against which it becomes all to be on their guard.

Allied, in its nature, to the two forms of overmuch righteousness that have been mentioned, is a third, namely, censoriousness. The mentor arrogates to himself a superior degree of excellence, which sometimes is admitted, but not by those who recognize it as the outgrowth from either a self-complacently rigid or else an uncharitable judgment of the conduct of others. The censorship over the opinions, the morals, and the practices of other people can be exercised in the extreme degree to which it sometimes is carried, by an immaculate being only. As there is none such among men, the attempt on the part of anyone to indulge the disposition to criticize the acts and the words of his neighbors, indicates a blemish upon the character of the haughty critic which not seldom is removed only through the application of severe remedies which, far from justifying the impeachment of Providence on the ground of injustice, gives occasion to praise the wisdom of the loving Father who withholds not the rod from His child so long as he fails to see the beam in his own eyes while searching for the motes in the eyes of others. And if censoriousness, arising from the mistaken effort to make others conform to a private standard of righteousness, proudly regarded as the perfect standard, justly receives painful treatment for its correction, shall it not, when it springs from uncharitableness, thus be dealt with without the discipline becoming the occasion for anyone to say even in his heart, "The ways of the Lord with the good are not equal?" The greatest writers of fiction often picture the extravagances and the follies of men even within the sphere of religious things; and, true to the reality, narrate the calamities experienced in consequence by those who are guilty of them. Thus Sir Walter Scott, in "The Heart of Midlothian," delineates the character of the censorious David Deans, and describes the agony which he endured through the mis step of his wayward daughter Effie. A careless judge of a history, such as that of Deans, would blame Providence for unduly oppressing a good man, but they whom Deans represents, sanctified by their afflictions, would imitate him in repeatedly acknowledging that their sufferings were designed to direct their attention to themselves and to humble their self-sufficient pride.

Let the "overmuch righteousness" be avoided for the reason that it nurtures a conceit which incapacitates for the true righteousness as a gift, and for the true righteousness as a practice; also, because it leads to rebellion against God under the very troubles which, as has been seen, may be traced to it as their cause; and finally, because it fails not be followed by the fate of all who, weighed in the balances of a genuine righteousness, come lamentably short.

The wise king who, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, said, "Be not righteous overmuch," on the same authority provides the remedy: Fear God and seek the wisdom that is from above.

The Reading Room.

Holiday Books.

....“AMERICAN ART.” With Text by S. R. Koehler. A superb folio, containing twenty-five plates, selected from public and private collections. These are engravings from paintings or etchings from such artists as F. P. Vinton, F. A. Bridgman, Walter Shirlaw, Eastman Johnson, F. S. Church, Thomas Moran, Thomas Hovenden, Windslow Homer, George Inness, Elihu Vedder, R. Swain Gifford, and more than a dozen others of equal or almost equal reputation. Messrs. Thomas Moran, I. M. Gaugengigl, S. J. Guy, and R. Swain Gifford etch their own pictures. The other illustrations are engraved or etched by James D. Smillie, F. Juengling, F. E. Fillebrown, Geo. A. Teel, or other not less well known and admired etchers or engravers. Mr. Koehler occupies himself with a history of the fresh impulse given to American art in 1877, its nature and progress, and its achievements down to the present year, and the promise in it for the future. He proves himself a faithful historian, a judicious, sympathetic and appreciative critic. Afterward he devotes some pages to a consideration of American art as exhibited in landscape, portraiture, decorative art, still life, and in genre pictures. The text is one of the most instructive treatises, upon our national art of the last decade, hitherto compiled and published. The critical record is so free from diffuseness, so uniformly interesting, that it will be read to the end with unflagging attention.

All lovers of art have their favorite artists and pictures, and some may be a little disappointed because they do not appear in this work, but it will be conceded that the editor has made a selection fairly representative of the American art of the present time, that the pictures chosen are worthy of a place in such a collection and that they have been etched or engraved with the highest skill.

The volume is very beautiful and valuable. It is published in a noble, princely form. (Cassell & Co.)

....“HAPPY HUNTING GROUNDS.” By Wm. Hamilton Gibson. Mr. Gibson has no peer in the province of art he has made his own In fidelity to nature, in the reproduction of the most delicate details, in ability to select charming nooks and aspects of the fields and woods, to apprehend the secret of their charm and to delineate it with the pencil, he is without an equal. No less skill is exhibited in the compositions which his fancy creates. In originality, beauty and grace the initial letters and vignettes which adorn his books are unequalled. This volume affords abundant proof that his hand has not lost its cunning, while the text bears evidence of a wider familiarity with the best literature, an increasing maturity in thought and an enlarged power of expression. There is also often in the drawings and in the verbal descriptions a refined and delicate humor rarely found anywhere. Here are scores of most beautiful drawings, intelligent and captivating descriptions of nature in all seasons and moods, admirable delineations of the characters of the men and women of the woods and fields, of their lives and habits and talk, and appropriate quotations in prose and verse from many authors. The book is a refreshment and a joy, is one of the most satisfactory of books, elevates the mind and refines the taste. The engraving, press work and binding,—all the handiwork of the book,—are as near perfection as one can expect to see in this age. The price of the volume is only seven dollars and a half. It would be worth while to pay five times that for it rather than be without it. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“DEMOCRACY AND OTHER ADDRESSES,” by James Russell Lowell, includes Democracy, Garfield, Stanley, Fielding, Coleridge, Books and Libraries, Wordsworth, and Don Quixote. All were delivered in England and were received with hearty admiration by critical audiences. To these is added the address delivered at the recent Harvard Anniversary commemorating the 250th year of its life. A book such as this calls for no commendation. It is enough to announce that it is published and to tell what it contains. Mr. Lowell is one of the most accomplished of living critics, is a master of virile and fascinating English, and mingles exquisite wit and humor with solid scholarship and learning as few men can. Few books are as engaging and instructive as those he writes. In his address at Harvard are passages which just now should become familiar to all interested in the American system of education. The volume is a very handsome one, is, in fact, in press-work and binding, similar to the “Riverside Aldines.” To every lover of good literature it would be a welcome holiday gift. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

....Similar in character to “One Year’s Sketch Book” and “Nature’s Hallelujah,” by Irene E. Jerome, is “THE MESSAGE OF THE BLUE BIRD,” by the same artist, published last spring, when some objection was made to the cover, but now encased in a rich binding of white and blue and gold. The artistic qualities which have given Miss Jerome an enviable fame are exhibited in these illustrations, and being in a smaller book are brought within the reach of those whose purses are not long and full. (Lee & Shepard.)

....“VOICES” and “CHOICES,” separate ribbon-tied little books, with covers ornamented in gold and colors, may be described as a series of illuminated Scripture cards with comments, interleaved with selections from such poets as Montgomery, Miss Havergal, Horatio Bonar, and Mrs. Whitney. They have been arranged by Helen P. Strong. A companion is entitled “THE PASSION FLOWER,” and has been prepared by the Rev. Dr. C. S. Hageman, and is intended to show what Christ has done for us and to prompt the inquiry, What am I doing for Him? Here the texts, verses and comments are decorated with passion flowers in quiet colors. (American Tract Society.)

....Among the most desirable of the dainty ribbon-tied little books are “SEEKERS AFTER THE LIGHT,” in which four sections of a selection from Ben Hur, relating to the expectation by the wise men of the appearance of the Redeemer, are accompanied by as many etchings of much merit by F. M., making with the ornamented cover a pleasing and appropriate Christmas book. And “MISTLETOE SPRAYS,” and HOLLY LEAVES,” each cut in the shape of a leaf, ornamented with the leaves and berries of the shrubs from which they are named, and including pages of poetical selections describing the use of the mistletoe and holly at the Christmas festival and embodying sentiments awakened by the holiday season.

The same house has put within covers of embossed figured paper, decorated in gold, “THEIR CHRISTMAS DINNER,” by Charles Dickens; “CHRISTMAS,” by Washington Irving, and in four little books popular Christmas verses by Frances Ridley Havergal and other poets.

All of these are in excellent taste and very inviting. (George R. Lockwood & Son.)

....“AMONG THE LAWMAKERS.” By Edmund Alton. This volume, most of the contents of which appeared as a serial in St. Nicholas, is a very agreeable compend of information as to methods of proceeding in Congress, and is adapted to the old as well as the young. It is nicely printed and appropriately illustrated. The book is worthy of a wide circulation. (Charles Scribner’s Sons.)

....“HOME LIFE IN SONG WITH THE POETS OF TO-DAY.” This collection of short poems was first published about seven years ago, and was greatly enjoyed. The present edition has been enlarged by the addition of about one hundred new poems, and in respect to neatness of binding and the superior character of the contents is deserving of high praise. The poems have been gleaned from a wide range of periodical literature and have been selected with that rare good taste and nice discrimination which are characteristic of Mr. Randolph’s compilations. Among the inexpensive gift-books of the season this volume ought to have a conspicuous place. (A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)

....“FOR LOVE’S SAKE. Poems of Faith and Comfort.” By Margaret J. Preston. The title of this tasteful volume is happily chosen and fairly indicates the general character of the contents. These short poems aim to give expression to the aspirations of the devoted Christian, to incite to stronger faith and more thorough consecration, and to afford comfort in hours of despondency and sorrow. For grace of diction, as well as for their stimulating and helpful suggestions, the verses will be appreciated, we are sure, by many Christian readers. (A. D. F. Randolph & Co.)

....“HISTORY OF THE SECOND ARMY CORPS IN THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.” Handsomely bound, with gilt top, and illustrated with portraits of famous generals. A glowing record of the part of the corps in the great conflict by Gen. Francis A. Walker, its Assistant Adjutant-General from Oct. 9th, 1862, to Jan. 12th, 1865. Has excellent maps. Graphic descriptions of the Peninsula, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, and on to Petersburg and Appomattox. Just the book to give on Christmas to one interested in the war. (Charles Scribner’s Sons.)

....“THE SENTIMENTAL CALENDAR.” By J. S. of Dale. The short stories included under the above title are twelve in number, and most of them have appeared already in the magazines. Their average excellence is high, and the book is a pleasant one with which to spend an occasional half hour of leisure. (Scribners.)

....Messrs. White, Stokes & Allen have begun a series of “Lives of the Presidents,” of which two have been issued, viz.: “WASHINGTON” and “GRANT,” each by William O. Stoddard, a practised writer. Such a series we should think would prove to be both interesting and useful. The volumes before us are just what the general reader, old or young, would desire.

....“A MOTHER’S SONG.” By Mary D. Brine. Illustrated by Miss C. A. Northam. In this book the poet and artist have wrought together in beautiful sympathy. The poem is a song of mother-love, and each stanza is fitly set in a margin of dream-like pictures, while a number of full-page illustrations add to the beauty of the book, which deserves a high place among the many artistic works issued by the publishers. (Cassell & Co.)

....“UNDER BLUE SKIES. Pictures and Verses.” By Mrs. S. J. Brigham. The pictures are in colors representing happy groups of little boys and girls engaged in their favorite pleasures and pastimes, which are described on the opposite pages by verses having a jolly jingle, the pages being beautified with cute and delicate etchings of vines, birds, butterflies, kittens and toads. The book is beautifully bound in illuminated board, and lacks nothing to make it a thing of delight to childhood. (Worthington Co.)

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....Travel and Adventure will be largely represented in the coming volume of The Youth’s Companion by such popular writers as Lieut. Schwatka, C. F. Holder, Wm. T. Hornaday, the Hon. S. S. Cox, Col. T. W. Knox, Col. W. H. Gilder and Lieut. Shufeldt.

....No previous number has surpassed the December Century in the high character of its contributions and illustrations. It has a striking frontispiece portrait of Henry Clay, with an interesting description by pen and pencil of Ashland, his home, and delightful reminiscences by his executor, J. O. Harrison. “The Minister’s Charge,” which worthily ranks among W. D. Howells’ best stories, is concluded. John G. Nicolay and John Hay give the second instalment of their “Abraham Lincoln,” describing him, in a most engaging way, as soldier, surveyor and politician. The chapter is embellished with fac simile stanzas from Stedman’s poem, “The Hand of Lincoln,” an engraving of the hand and nineteen other illustrations. The War Articles relate to Gettysburg, and are by Gen. Henry J. Hunt and Gen. E. M. Law; both faithfully illustrated The religious article of the number appears under “Open Letters,” and is The Union of the American Churches from a Methodist Episcopal Point of View, by Rev. Dr. George R. Crooks. It is a valuable contribution on the subject.

....The Forum for this month opens with a good article on the Present Outlook for Christianity, by W. S. Lilly Pres. Robinson tells most instructively how he was educated. Judge Thomas has a stupid paper on Wills, and Dr. L. W. Bacon one of his aggressive articles on the Alternative of Prohibition. The Confessions of a Methodist are less entertaining than its predecessors in the same series. The number concludes with an outspoken Letter of Dr. Howard Crosby to the People of New York, as clear and trenchant and wholesome as the valiant Doctor’s utterances usually are. Would that they whom he addresses would heed his wise counsels.

....The English Illustrated Magazine for the holidays appears in a double number rich in literary attractions and captivating engravings. A very effective Study of a Head, from a drawing by Alma Tadema introduces the number, followed by an entertaining article on Venice, abounding in picturesque drawings by Clara Montalba; by A Siege Baby, a lively story, by the author of “Bootle’s Baby;” a superbly illustrated article by Grant Allen on Surrey Mill-Wheels; a very interesting paper, liberally illustrated, by D Rice-Jones, disclosing The Heart of London, and by other no less engaging contributions. The cover is of the color of holly berries.

....Harper’s Young People continues to deserve its reputation of being a most excellent periodical. Every week its readers are treated to a number of good stories, poems and articles replete with information. The Post-Office Box is a very attractive feature of the paper, and gives the boys and girls an opportunity to make each other’s acquaintance by the aid of pen and ink.

....The Youth’s Companion will not allow itself to be out-distanced in the race for favor with the young folks. It is always pleasing, wholesome and instructive, and is deservedly popular.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

A Change of Heart.

BY ELA THOMAS.

Part I.

IT was a thrifty garden, with its neatly-arranged, well-weeded beds and inviting vegetables, in all the luxuriance of June-time growth, and Miss Hester Ann Rexrood, picking peas at the long, trim rows, might well be pardoned for the complacent look with which she surveyed it.

A woman past her youth was Hester Ann Rexrood, as the threads of gray in her hair and the fine wrinkles beginning to show on her square cut face indicated. But a woman still in the prime of life and health, tall and sinewy, with no lines of grace, angular as to shoulders and elbows, but with strength in every motion, and muscles hard and firm as whip cords.

It was what the neighbors called a "sightly place," the old Rexrood homestead, and, pausing in her occupation, Hester Ann's glance passed beyond the garden over the fields, across which the rows of young corn lay like long green ribbons; where oats were pearly green, and wheat was showing the first faint golden tinge, and meadows of tall grass rippled like lakes of soft green billows, and along the brown road winding away into the blue distance, along which farm-houses were scattered amid clustering orchards. But this fair, widespread landscape had been before her eyes from earliest childhood, and no thought of its beauty was in her mind, as with a smile of satisfaction on her thin, firm, shut lips, she turned her keen, gray eyes to the yard, divided from her by rows of currant bushes, where long lines of freshly washed garments were fluttering in the breeze. For was not hers the only washing yet in sight?

This was the rule and not an exception. Each Monday morning, while other housewives were yet toiling over their tubs, high up on the green hillside those lines of snowy linen waved like victorious banners, the envy of her tardier neighbors and her own pride, for Hester Ann had a deep contempt for weak backs, uncertain nerves, and slow-moving hands—a contempt that found expression in actions even more than words; some women went dishevelled and untidy all wash day; her Monday cleaning was out of the way, her hair brushed and braided, her clean sunbonnet and print dress as stiff and smooth as starch and flat-irons could make them; some women indulged in picked-up dinners on wash day, she always made that meal a little extra, as witness the dressed chicken in the pantry, and peas rapidly transferring from the vines to the tin basin.

Nor was this conscious and acknowledged superiority confined to Mondays; it extended through every day in the week, and every kind of work that came under her charge, till Hester Ann had come to consider herself, and was accepted by others, as the standard against which more luckless mortals were to be measured and found wanting.

To a stranger in Hopton it at first seemed a little strange that the Rexrood farm and all that pertained to it was always spoken of as "Hester Ann's," notwithstanding the presence of her widowed mother and brother Elias, a man of twenty-five. But in the years succeeding the death of Sala Rexrood, when Elias was a lad hardly in his teens, Hopton had come to regard her as the head of the family, and such she had virtually remained. As one of themselves, her town folks were not without a certain pride in Hester Ann, her business shrewdness, her practical ability, and were wont to point to the large farm, whose high condition and unmistakable thrift evidenced her skill and energy.

In one thing, however, Hopton was mistaken—the sacrifice Hester Ann was by common consent supposed to have made for her family. In the first place, they had no idea of the strength of her attachment to the old homestead, a Rexrood inheritance as well as her firm set mouth, for her father and his father before him had lived and died in the tall red house. The sacrifice would have been in leaving instead of continuing on it. While as to "the burden of care," had they but known it, the sense of managing, ordering, holding the reins of authority over everything, from the men in the field to the sheep in the pasture, was a pleasure, beside which the picnics and parties and ordinary enjoyments of young people were as nothing. And as to marriage, the stream of her affections was not overflowing. No suitor (and they had not been lacking) had ever stirred that well regulated organ, her heart; romance and sentiment were no part of her nature. And as she had been heard to express it, she "couldn't see what under the light of the sun any woman wanted to get married for and have a husband to boss her, when if she lived single she could be her own master."

Hester Ann had been a dutiful daughter and sister, but as to the sacrifice of hopes, or pangs, or feelings that many natures would have had to make, such was far from the case.

In the meantime, she accepted the tribute to her excellences as only her due, and went her way in the serene consciousness of superiority to the common run of weak-kneed, incapable mortals.

One of the few disturbances of this serenity was communion Sundays, for, as Hester Ann expressed it, she was not a "professor." The realm of the purely spiritual was one for which she had no time, and felt little interest; her strength was, and it seemed to her always would be, sufficient for itself; her will had too long been the will of all around her, to yield readily even to the Divine will. More than all, she felt it well-nigh an injustice that she, Hester Ann Rexrood, honest, honorable, truthful, living a life above reproach, should be expected to confess herself what she certainly was not, a sinner, and to ask what she could never by any possibility need, forgiveness from God or man; and almost a personal indignity that a privilege of the Church should be withheld from her and extended to others in whose lives her keen eyes had detected many a flaw. This was a feeling she never confessed, not even by an absence on the communion Sabbath, when she always rose and left before the sacrament with a dignity under which no one would have suspected the lurking sense of discomfort, not to say humiliation.

On this June morning all such thoughts were far away; her washing was out, the weather was favorable, the hay crop promised to be fine, the price of butter was advancing, and life seemed to her a most good and excellent thing, and this world, as she not infrequently said, "as good a place as she ever wanted to live in."

This pleasant mood, however, was disturbed by a step behind her, and turning, she saw her brother Elias. The lower part of Elias Rexrood's face was covered with a short brown beard, but his eyes, though gray, were darker and softer than his sister's, and the evident resemblance between the two was varied by a certain likeness, that from character extended to manner and feature, to the milder natured mother—a likeness which Hester Ann, with all her affection for that mother, secretly regretted as Coppage instead of Rexrood. Had Hester Ann been in an observant mood, she would have noticed his evident embarrassment as he paused beside her; but her eyes as well as mind were on the vines before her, and without pausing she questioned briefly, "What is it?"

"Well, Hester Ann," shifting uneasily from one foot to the other, "I had something I wanted to tell—I wanted to talk to you a little."

"Talk away," laconically, her idea still being that it was something concerning the farm work, "only be quick about it, for I've 'most peas enough, and the butter needs working over."

Elias hesitated a moment, and then, perhaps impelled by her admonition or his inability to find any gradual approach to the subject, he, as it were, seized it with both hands and flung it at her with the announcement, "Hester Ann, I'm going to be married."

The handful of peas fell to the ground. It was like a clap of thunder from a clear sky to this sister, the senior by fourteen years. Elias was still a boy to be looked after, and in a certain sense guided. She expected he would marry sometime, but that was an event of the far-off future, and he had no idea how sudden the shock was to her, or that it was the pain which comes to any, who, believing themselves essential to another's well-being, suddenly find that they have been set aside. This gave an added curtness to her tone, as she exclaimed: "Married; I'd like to know what has put that in your head?"

"I don't know why it shouldn't be in my head," he rejoined, assuming at once the defensive. "I'm old enough, and I'm sure my father set me the example."

Hester Ann felt the thrust, for his father was the pattern she had daily set before him. "He waited, I presume, till he had some sense, and some need of a wife; and, besides, I thought Flavinia wasn't coming back from her sister's till next winter."

For Hester Ann had not failed to make due provision for this, as for all contingent events, however remote, and had decided that, when the proper time came, Elias should bestow his hand and heart upon a certain Flavinia Fish. The Fishes and Rexroods, being equally old and respected families, had continued friendly for generations. Moreover, their farms were contiguous, and Flavinia was an only child—all of which, as she had impressed it on Elias, made it an alliance eminently suitable to the Rexrood name and dignity.

Elias remembered all this, as, giving a pebble an impatient kick, he replied:

"I'm not going to marry Flavinia Fish, and never said I was."

"Who is it, then?"

"Lettie Goddard."

"For heaven's sake!" gasped Hester Ann. "You—a Rexrood—to think of marrying a 'Creeker,' and old Hapgood Goddard's daughter, at that. Elias, are you crazy?"

The "Creekers" being a term often applied to the dwellers along Flat Creek, a little stream bordered by a barren ridge of hills, whose owners were all poor, Hapgood Goddard having been one of the most unthrifty of all. Had Hester Ann been a woman of more curves, mental as well as physical, she would have formulated her opposition differently; but she was surprised and bewildered as well as angry. It was a new experience to have her opinions set at naught this way; for people whose plans failed she had scant pity, as she was wont to boast. "She laid her plans and then worked them out." All her life she had overcome obstacles by main strength, and she went at this in the same blind way.

Elias' eyes kindled. Hidden by his beard was a square chin, akin to his sister's. Though seldom apparent, he had his share of that inflexibility commonly referred to as "the Rexrood of it." With him softening mosses had crept over the granite, but the granite was still there. "I certainly am thinking of marrying Lettie, and I should like to know what you have against her?"

"She's a 'Creeker,' that's enough; and she's Hapgood Goddard's daughter, and that's more than enough. When you see a block you know what the chips will be—lazy and good-for-nothing, it runs in the blood."

"I don't know that to be poor's a crime, though you seem to think it is; and I don't know that Hapgood Goddard ever hurt anybody in his lifetime, and he certainly won't now he's dead; and whatever her father was, Lettie's not to blame for it; and as to her being lazy, she's no such thing."

Hester Ann gave a sniff. "Much you know about it—but what on earth set you after her, I can't imagine."

"I like her," said Elias, simply. He had meant to say love, but checked the word as he glanced in his sister's face, and all the happiness and brightness of his little romance, so commonplace in itself, but so much to him, which he was longing to pour out to her he buried in his heart. "And I hope you'll remember," he continued, "that when you talk about Lettie you are talking of my future wife."

Hester Ann bit her lips. "I hope you'll remember that I tried to prevent your making a fool of yourself, but if you are bound to do it, we may as well divide up," the practical side of the matter asserting itself from long habit even in the midst of her anger. "There's a hundred acres south of the house, and a hundred and fifteen north, and father always said that one acre of the bottom meadow was worth two of the scrub hill pasture, which will make it about even, and we can divide the stock according to its value."

"I had hoped," with a slight hesitation, "that Lettie could come right here and you would be a sister to her, and everything go on as it always had."

"You needn't hope any such thing. I suppose nobody can help your marrying all Flat Creek if your head's set that way, but I don't propose to sister that kind of folks. I don't want any Lettie Goddards mixing in with my work and spoiling my butter and wearing out the things I've worked hard to save. If you marry her I give you fair warning, I shall go my way and expect her to go hers."

"You needn't worry. I'll build a house on my part of the farm, and we won't trouble you."

"No, Elias," with a quick survey of the situation, "there's barn room enough for both of us, and when mother and I are gone it will all be yours. 'Twould be a foolish waste of money to build another house. You can have the two rooms on the west side of the hall and the chamber over them, and build on an ell with a kitchen and buttery and bed-room, that will give you all the room you need.'

"But you may marry yourself."

"Marry!" with fierce scorn. "I hope I've got past my greens and haven't come to my dotage." And with that parting shot she walked toward the house and into the sitting-room, where her mother, a mild-faced old lady, sat knitting.

"Well, mother," she said grimly, "we've had cut worms, and potato bugs, and hail-storms, and I said then I wondered what next, and it came. Elias is going to be married, and to Lettie Goddard at that.

"Do tell," and Mrs. Rexrood dropped her knitting in surprise. "Why, it seems hardly more than yesterday that he was a little boy in jackets."

"And he hasn't any more sense than he had then, and as for that girl, I wish she had never been born! To think that he should throw away such a chance as the Fish farm."

"O, well," said the old lady, soothingly, "everybody has to choose for himself, and he might 'a' done worse. Lettie's well favored and healthy lookin', an' seems good disposed."

"I know some call her pretty, but I never could see it, and since she made a 'profession' folks are fairly eat up with her. I'll warrant she did it just to catch Elias. But if she comes here, one thing is certain, I shall keep my own side of the house, and give her a good letting alone."

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

Little Biddy McQuade.

LITTLE Biddy McQuade lived with her father, mother and sister somewhere in the north-western part of Ireland. Her home was a poor hut, not worthy of the name of house. Her father had built it himself of mud and stones. It had but a single room, in which the whole family were compelled to live. So long as they were able by hard labor to gain a small sum of money each week with which to buy their supply of coarse food, they were quite content.

Biddy would have been much surprised could she have looked into a comfortable American home when the family were taking a meal. She would not have known the use of the number of dishes, spoons, knives and forks which are upon every well-furnished table.

Could she have heard a little girl who had good food to eat complaining because her meat was tough, or crying for another piece of cake, I do not know what she would have said. I believe that she would have thought her very ungrateful.

Biddy's clothing consisted of a single cotton gown, which her mother occasionally washed and dried over night. She was working hard to earn money enough to buy for herself a woollen shawl to tie over her head when she went out, as her sister Mary did.

Yes, Biddy had reached only her eighth birthday; but her time was spent in steady work. Was it not cold, winter weather? and was not her father without employment? and were not she and her mother and Mary glad to ply their needles for twelve hours a day if, by so doing, they could earn a few cents apiece?

The mother did cotton embroidery, but the sisters knit children's clothing. Biddy had learned how to make babies' socks and skirts, and she hoped soon to be able to make larger garments. She and Mary were in the habit of carrying their handiwork when completed to a village ten miles distant. There it was bought by a lady who sent it, together with the work of a great many other girls, to be sold in the London shops.

On Biddy's birthday morning she awoke to find no pleasant surprise awaiting her—no pretty picture-book, or gaily-dressed doll, or other gifts of love. She awoke to find the little cabin full of smoke, but very cold; her mother lying in bed and moaning with the pain of rheumatism; her father absent in search of something to do, and Mary moving about silently with tears in her eyes.

"What's the matter, Mary?" asked Biddy, when she got a chance, "do you think mother's going to die?"

"No, unless it's of starvation. We've only a bite in the house for breakfast, and though it's pay day, I'll not be able to leave home with the work."

"Never mind, Mary," said Biddy bravely, "I'll take the work to the village."

"What! a bit of a thing like you to go alone? I'd fear something would be happening to you."

"O no, Mary, I'll ask the Lord to take care of me. Don't you know the new teacher told us that we must trust Him for everything?"

Mary did remember the words which she had heard only a few days before, and the memory helped her as it did her little sister.

"Well, Biddy, go then," she answered, "and may the Lord watch over you."

It was a weary tramp at best, even with Mary by her side, but doubly long for the child who must brave fatigue, cold and hunger all alone.

Near the village, however, she fell in with some young girls whom she knew, and their companionship was a comfort to her. Going back, too, they were with her for a part of the way. When they left her her feet felt heavy and her hands were nearly frozen; but her heart was light, for she had her hard-earned wages and Mary's too—enough to buy food for the week to come. She stopped to buy it at the small store where the family traded—a little coarse meal and some very poor tea, that was all. Yet Biddy felt rich as she trudged courageously homeward.

She had something now for her sick mother to eat, and the love in her heart kept her almost warm. Her courage held out until she reached the door of the cabin. Perhaps it did not fail even then, but her strength at last gave way. She fell fainting to the floor, with the tea and meal in her arms.

"Poor child," said Mary, tenderly, as she bathed her face and brought her back to consciousness, "you'll soon feel better, darling, for I'll cook you a warm supper, and I'm sure you've earned it well."

Biddy told her sister afterward how very long the walk had seemed; how sometimes she was uncertain of the way, and sometimes it seemed as though she must yield to fatigue and hunger, "but I was sure I could keep on until I got home," said she. "I asked the Lord to help me and He did."

The Lord in whom Biddy placed her faith is the only friend who is always near, who can always help us, and in whom we can always trust.

COUSIN LOIS.

One-Tenth, and What it Did.

"TEN dollars, because I'm ten years old on the tenth of November! What a ten-times-one girl I am getting to be!" laughed little Nell as she joyfully clasped the bright gold piece which she had found at her breakfast-plate that morning; and then, as she realized the burden of great riches, she sighed: "But, O mamma! what shall I ever do with so much?"

Mamma, looking earnestly at her little daughter for a moment, asked: "Are you sure it's all yours, Nell?"

Nell suddenly remembered a verse they had talked over the Sunday before, and her own face grew serious as she slowly asked: "You mean I must give back a tenth to the Lord?"

"No, dear," said the wise mamma; "I was only wondering what the Lord would think about it, and what my little girl would think about it."

There was a long pause, during which Nell fell into a brown study; and mamma heard the former burdened possessor of wealth murmur: "One-tenth—one whole dollar out of only ten."

But something seemed to be at work; for the next audible remark was: "Mamma, what do you think God would like me to do with His dollar?"

"Oh! you've decided to give it to Him, have you?"

"Oh, yes!" it belongs to Him, you know, and one out of ten isn't much."

If mamma noticed a quiver in the brave little voice, she didn't appear to; for she replied: "What do you say to the Christmas Letter Mission?"

Now, anything with Christmas in it was sure to be agreeable, and in Nell's small experience, letters were not altogether unpleasant things; so, bringing her little chair close to mother's side, with the brown curly head nestling against mother's arm, she was ready to "hear all about it."

"Once upon a time," began mamma, "about fifteen years ago, I think, there was started in England what was called the Pillow Mission, because by it pretty cards and letters were provided to be put under the pillows in the hospital beds, so that on Christmas morning each patient would wake to find there a letter addressed to him."

"And who wrote the letters, mamma?" asked Nell.

"Good people gave money to have them printed, and each one was put in an envelope, with 'A Christmas Letter for You,' on the outside. Just think, Nell, how happy it made the poor friendless sick people who lay there groaning, day after day, to get a letter all of their own! And the little children in orphan asylums, who had no bright Christmas trees or presents,—how happy they would be to get a card and a letter for a Christmas present! They couldn't imagine at first where they came from; and one little girl thought the Queen must have written them, and wrote a letter thanking her! Well, this mission, which began with only a few, kept on growing and growing; so that now it has spread over the United States, and in ever so many hospitals and asylums, and homes for the sick and homeless, hearts are gladdened on the dear Lord's birthday by a Christmas letter; and often their thoughts are turned from their physical pain and weariness to the Great Physician who waits to heal their souls."

When mamma finished speaking, she noticed that all the clouds had vanished from the sunny face at her side, and there was no regret in Nell's voice as she exclaimed: "How many letters do you think one dollar could send?"

"I believe," said mamma, with a faint smile, "that each letter, with envelope and all, costs five cents; and if you wish, we will write to the secretary to day, and see what use she can make of the birthday tithe."

"Oh, do!" cried Nell enthusiastically; and performing a rapid example in division, she added, "Just think of making twenty people happy with my tenth!"

If little Nell could have looked in the ward of a certain hospital the next Christmas morning, and could have seen the smiles and tears of joy that lighted up twenty sad faces, she would have known that it is more blessed to give than to receive; as it was, she had learned by giving up that tenth, that the Lord repays a hundred fold, even when we give Him back His own.

If there should be other little girls or other mammas who would like to send Christmas letters this year, the central secretary, Miss H. M. Cox, Newtown, New York, or Miss Mary Bussing, secretary for New York city, will gladly give information, or receive contributions for this Mission in the name of Christ.—*Sophea Rhea, in S. S. Finish What You Begin.

MY old great-grandmother Knox had a way of making her children finish their work. If they began a thing, they must complete it. If they undertook to build a cob-house, they must not leave it until it was done, and nothing of the work or play to which they set their hands would she allow them to abandon incomplete. I sometimes wish I had been trained in this way. How much of life is wasted in unfinished work! Many a man uses up his time in splendid beginnings. The labor devoted to commence ten things and leave them useless would finish five of them and make them profitable and useful. Finish your work. Life is brief; time is short. Stop beginning forty things, and go back and finish four. —Christian Observer.

Holiday Books.

...."How? or, Spare Hours Made Profitable for Boys and Girls." By Kennedy Holbrook. Illustrated. This fine octavo of over three hundred and fifty pages, elegantly bound in illuminated cloth, was originally written to afford amusement and occupation on rainy Saturdays and long vacations to the children of the author's own family. Giving it to the public was an afterthought. It has in it a bit of everything in the line of childish amusement—illustrative pictures to delight the eye, beguiling games to entice the mind, and ingenious puzzles to employ the fingers. If children cannot find entertainment for hours at a stretch in the midst of these windmill puppets, flying whirligigs, grimacing faces, balancing dolls, boomerangs, string and slate games, numerous puzzles and other curiosities, then they are beyond being amused. (Worthington Co.)

...."Make Thy Way Mine." By George Klingle, and "Lyrical Poems," by Alfred Lord Tennyson, are dainty 16mo volumes, belonging to a series published by White, Stokes & Allen, on fine laid paper, with wide margins and limp parchment covers.

...."Holy-Tides," by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., are seven songs of Advent, Christmas, Epiphany, Lent, Easter, Whitsun and Trinity, with illuminated title-page, bound in heavy white paper with red-line margin.

Progress in Palestine.

A RECENT number of the London Spectator contains a surprising summary of the changes for the better which have occurred during a few years in what is properly designated as Syria, but which is generally spoken of as Palestine. Beyrout has improved so much that those who visited it twenty years ago would now hardly recognize it. From a population of from 15,000 to 20,000 it has increased to 80,000, is well paved and lighted, has a corps of street scavengers, has practically been rebuilt and in the Western style, under the supervision of a German architect. The shipping visiting the port now amounts yearly to about 400 steamers and 3,500 sailing vessels.

The progress in Jaffa has been no less marked. The old wall has been removed, many new houses built, not a few of imposing size and style, and the town has on two sides a series of suburbs built by Arab immigrants from Upper Egypt. The country around this ancient city has been converted almost into an earthly paradise, by the multiplication of orange-groves, orchards and fruit gardens. There are now four hundred orange-groves of from two to fifteen acres, from which eight to ten millions of oranges are exported annually. The account in the Spectator proceeds with these interesting particulars:

"The most convincing proof of the growing prosperity of Jaffa is to be found in the price of land. It has risen ten, and in some cases fifteen-fold; a plot that would, with difficulty, have fetched £5 twenty years ago, is now not to be bought for £50 or £60. Practically speaking, land near Jaffa is not to be had. Even the lesser towns along the coast show signs of renewed activity. Haifa, the little port at the foot of Mount Carmel, has roused from its torpor, and gone in for building and rebuilding,—on a small scale, of course. It is so changed, that Herr Schick, the Government Surveyor of Buildings, declares he did not recognize the place when he revisited it in 1880. Cæsarea, once famous, but wholly deserted for centuries, is on the high-road to become once again a centre of trade. There is the nucleus of a new town rising, inhabited by Moslem immigrants from Bosnia and Herzegovina; a custom-house is built, and a line of steamers will call there regularly. In the larger towns of the interior, the note of progress has been struck, and all are in a state of transition. Bethlehem has been almost entirely rebuilt, and improved out of all knowledge. The streets were formerly impassable in winter; now they are paved and tolerably clean, passable at any time. The same may be said of Tiberias and Nazareth. Nablous—the ancient Shechem where Joseph was sold—is become one vast soapboiling establishment. Its product is in general demand throughout Syria, and it may yet become the Northampton of Palestine for boots. The most satisfactory sign of progress in the interior is, in our opinion, the advance in agriculture, and the steady increase in the number of those who appear to devote themselves to agricultural pursuits. Everywhere the traveller hears of new plantations being made, and sees new gardens fenced in. Between Nazareth, Safet, and Nablous, where the olive thrives best, olive-trees are being planted at the rate—it is locally stated—of 500,000 a year; and the product of the district in the shape of olive-oil is already upwards of six million okes, or fifteen million pounds' weight, for it is so measured there, annually. Highly significant, as we remarked, is the fact that the country people and peasantry are investing their money largely in cattle-rearing, a thing undreamed of a few years back. If the Government would only protect the fellah from the roving 'Bedawi'—who hails the tiller of the soil as the 'father of cabbages,' and looks down upon him as the 'hhamar ed-dunia,' or 'the ass of the world,' to say nothing of religiously robbing him whenever, or rather as often as, opportunity offers—rural Syria would have a chance of thriving again.

"The order of things in Jerusalem, too, is very different from what it was only a few years ago, and the change the Holy City is gradually undergoing strikes every traveller who has revisited the place after an interval of eight or ten seasons. Whole quarters have been rebuilt, sanitation is cared for, the streets are well lighted, clocks are placed on many public buildings, and the gates are no longer closed at sundown, to the inconvenience of residents and the hindrance of trades-people. The tanneries and slaughterhouses have been removed to a distance, and outside the walls of the ancient enclosure a 'new Jerusalem' is slowly rising, that at the present rate of growth, will, in a very few years, quite overshadow the old city, exceeding it both in area and population. Suburbs are springing up round about and extending, notably on the western side. And as Herr Schick, the Government Surveyor, estimates the number of dwellings to have 'probably trebled' in five-and-twenty years, some idea may be formed of the rate at which Syria is making progress, notwithstanding many and serious disadvantages. Old residents record other changes, no less satisfactory and suggestive because unconnected with the material prosperity of the country. There is more toleration, and a better feeling generally between Moslems, Christians and Jews. Schools have increased in number, and there have been more pupils in attendance of late years. And this is reflected, so it is asserted, in an improved race of handicraftsmen, who turn out sounder work than formerly, and are beginning to develop some amount of artistic taste in their productions."

A LARGE COMPANY of gentlemen and ladies representing the best elements of the life of this city, gathered in the Council Chamber of the University of the City of New York, last Monday evening, to congratulate Mr. Charles Butler on the completion of his fiftieth year of service as a member of the Council. A half-century is a long time to spend in such a position, especially in a city where men come and go as they do here, and where popular favor is so readily transferred from one man to another. Addresses were presented in behalf of the Council, the Faculty, the Alumni, the Regents of the State University, and the Union Theological Seminary. Mr. Butler's life has been a very busy one. In the days of his greatest vigor and activity he had a large part in measures affecting the prosperity of a number of the States of the Union, and in the commercial and financial organizations which have promoted the prosperity of this city. To his sagacity and foresight the country at large and the city owe a great debt. It is to his honor that, notwithstanding his many duties and engagements, he has found time to take an active and important part in the development of one of the city's most important institutions. After the long and varied experience of Mr. Butler, it is significant that in his reply to the congratulations received, when speaking of education "in its highest forms and relations as the most important of all interests to the welfare and renown of the city and State," he should select as worthy of special notice and commendation this only from the fundamental principles embodied in the constitution of the University:

"Recognizing the paramount importance of a careful acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures for the present and future welfare of man, instruction shall be given in the evidences of revealed religion, in the literature and antiquities of the Bible and in its contents as the inspired rule of human duty."

The Boycott.

THE daily journals say that at the meeting of the Central Labor Union on Sunday last, a committee reported that the Theiss boycott and Ehret boycott of a few months ago were a mistake, were caused by a misunderstanding, and should not have been engaged in. The report, it is said, was laid upon the table. It would have been better to have given it consideration, and, if its statements were found to be correct, to have acknowledged that an error was made. Of Mr. Ehret, we know something. With his business,—that of a brewer—we have no sympathy, but for his charitable disposition all right-minded people will have much admiration. He is one of the chief benefactors, in this city, of poor Germans deserving assistance. The appeals he receives by mail at this time of the year are numerous, in fact, form a package of formidable size. He has an examination made into the condition of these applicants, and if they are found to be needy and worthy of help, he supplies their wants with a liberality not often equalled. The amount given to a single family may be small, but the sum of daily or weekly gifts to many families is a large amount. Not the sort of man to be boycotted, one would suppose, by those who know, or ought to know how generous his disposition is; but boycotted he was, notwithstanding.

The same meeting had under consideration the boycotting of the "capitalistic press," that is, the daily newspapers, because they freely discuss and criticize the action of the organized wage-earners. What a despotism the Union thinks of establishing! The freedom of the press is to be destroyed if possible. Freedom of discussiou of the acts of Unions and Assemblies is to be denied and brought to an end. Papers that print the advertisements of business houses which employ non-union men are especially to be boycotted, and those that by such publications assist firms with whom the Unions are in conflict.

These workmen greatly mistake the temper of the American people, if they suppose that such measures will be tolerated, or if they suppose that the free men of this Republic will allow the existence of organizations which propose and deliberate upon measures so unjust and tyrannical. Not long ago there was an increasing disposition to give the Unions legal standing, to incorporate them; but if they intend to arrogate to themselves the duties of State Attorney, jury, judge and sheriff, to arraign and punish men without trial, to find afterward, in some cases at least, if not often, that they have been mistaken, the community will hesitate before giving them a legal recognition and legal power. Only a few months ago sympathy with workmen was growing rapidly, but the events of the autumn and the actions proposed by the Unions have reduced that sympathy quite as rapidly.

Americans like to see the fair thing done all around. They are proud of the fact that the dignity of labor is acknowledged here as nowhere else and that the rewards of labor exceed those in any other country, but they have an ineradicable and indomitable love of freedom and will never submit to or allow a despotism exercised by secret societies.

Financial.

TUESDAY, DEC. 14.

THE visible supply of grain in the United States and Canada, east of the Rocky Mountains reported yesterday, was: Wheat, 59,928,530 bushels; corn, 11,616,827; oats, 5,122,963; being an increase for the week of 370,009 bushels of wheat, 121,968 of corn, and 158,613 of oats. The supply of wheat is only about 1,770,000 bushels in excess of that of Dec. 12th, 1885. The foreign markets were reported firm, and from India an advance of one shilling a quarter was reported. Quotations yesterday for January grain were: Wheat here 90 1-2, in Chicago 78 1-8; corn here 48 5-16, in Chicago 37; oats here 34 3-4, in Chicago 25 7-8. For cash wheat the quotations were: No. 1 red 93 cents, extra red 91 1-2-3-4, No. 2 red 90, State white 91; No. 1 hard Duluth 95 1-2. Provisions are firm. Hay and straw market dull, choice timothy 80 to 85 cents, clover mixed 60 to 65; No. 1 rye straw 60 to 70; oat 45 to 50. The closing quotations for cotton were: Dec. 9.45–46, Jan. 9.47–48, Feb 9.58–59, March 9.69–70.

The report of the city banks for the week showed loans increased $1,566,500, specie reduced $1,795,400, legal tenders reduced $491,000, deposits decreased $807,400, surplus of reserve diminished $2,085,450, making it $4,080,500. The rate for money fluctuated during the week from 4 per cent to 15, the average being about 7 per cent. The rate on commercial paper is from 5 1-2 to 6 1-2 per cent. The rate yesterday on call was 6 to 8 per cent, and at the close 12 per cent. The steamers arriving on Sunday brought $666,400 in gold.

The Stock Market broke yesterday morning and prices fell from 1 to 3 points. A partial recovery was made in the afternoon. These fluctuations are to be expected. The undertone is strong. The demand for money increases at this time of the year and the Stock Market feels the effect of it. Bank clearances last week at thirty-two cities show an advance of 15 per cent upon those of the same week last year. The increase amounted to $160,000,000.

The imports of merchandise at this port for the week were valued at $9,499,782, and the exports at $6,541,609. Imports at this port this year thus far exceed those of the corresponding part of 1885 about 40 millions of dollars, while exports have been 14 millions less. Foreign exchange sold yesterday for $4.80 1-2 for 60-day bills and $4.84 for demand for sterling.

A Baking Powder Matter.

More of the Albany Newspaper Investigation—The "Journal" reaffirms and emphasizes the Facts—Plain Talk from Prof. Tucker—His Opinion on Ammonia and Bread Risers Generally.

THE Albany, N. Y., Journal some time since published an interesting report upon the subject of baking powders, in which it gave the results of some tests of an elaborate character made for the purpose of determining the question of which is the best and wholesomest of these articles. The analyses and tests required were undertaken by Professors W. G. Tucker, of the Albany Medical College, and W. P. Mason, of the Renssalaer Polytechnic Institute, of Troy, chemists of the highest standing and reputation, well known for their extended and valuable services as public analysists. Messrs. Tucker and Mason, the Journal stated, had been directed to procure from dealers in Albany and Troy packages of baking powder, to analyze and critically examine them, and to make their reports of facts found entirely without bias or favor.

The report proved a matter of interest and importance, and was widely copied and commented upon. From the facts presented housekeepers had no difficulty in determining for themselves the best and most wholesome baking powder to use. The Journal, its facts having been questioned by a local baking powder manufacturer, returns to the subject and publishes the following interesting interview with Prof. Tucker. The facts before stated are reaffirmed and emphasized in the most breezy manner:

A Journal reporter recently visited Prof. Tucker for the purpose of gaining further information in reference to the baking powder question. He was found in the extensive laboratory of the Medical College, hard at work, but good-naturedly submitted to an inquisitorial interview, the substance of which, here given, will be found of interest.

"Doctor," said the reporter, "it appears that one of our local baking powder manufacturers attempts to discredit the report some time ago published in the Journal with reference to baking powders, for which the analytical examinations were made by yourself and Prof. Mason. Were your analysis and opinion printed correctly?"

"They were," replied Prof. Tucker, "literally."

"Is there any part of the report, or of your views expressed therein, that you would modify?"

"Not a word. My examination was most carefully and accurately made; the deductions I drew from the the tests were the inevitable ones, and the opinions I expressed were unquestionably correct."

"You say, Doctor, that the Royal baking powder is superior to any other baking powder which you have examined?"

"That is my report."

"Have you examined many other baking powders?"

"Quite a number."

"Wherein, Doctor, consists this superiority which you find in the Royal over other brands?"

"As stated in my report, in the great purity of its ingredients, in the unquestioned propriety and wholesomeness of those ingredients, in the exact proportions of the same, and the chemical accuracy and skill with which they have been combined. As I said before, it is, I believe, a baking powder 'unequaled for purity, strength and wholesomeness.'"

"Doctor, the Journal's lady readers would like you to inform them what are the peculiar virtues of a good baking powder over other and more old-fashioned methods of raising bread, biscuit and cake?"

"That would require a long answer, something in the nature of a lecture. Briefly, however, the advantage of such a baking powder over yeast consists in the quicker work it accomplishes, in the preservation of some of the best elements of the flour which are destroyed in the production of the carbonic acid gas by the use of yeast, and in the absolute certainty of sweet, light and digestible food. Over other methods for quick raising, the merits of a pure baking powder are great. It is always ready for use, the acid and alkali are combined in exact proportions to produce definite results, or to render the largest amount of leavening gas and leave nothing more than a neutral residuum, which is not the result where cream of tartar and soda are bought separately and mixed in the kitchen, for it will always occur where this is done that one or other of these substances will predominate, making the food yellow, heavy, bitter and unwholesome. Besides, the cream of tartar which can be procured by the housekeeper is mostly adulterated, adding to the uncertainty of the results or the unwholesomeness of the food. All these difficulties are avoided in the use of a pure, properly-made baking powder."

"Will baking powders keep? How long will they hold their strength?"

"If properly made, until used. A perfect baking powder must combine superlative strength with power to retain it indefinitely. Baking powders generally are robbed of the necessary preserving agent in order to give present strength, or else have their efficiency largely destroyed by the addition of large quantities of flour to prevent premature decomposition. The method by which both these qualities are retained in the highest degree produces the perfect article, and this I believe is fully accomplished in the Royal baking powder. I have seen an analysis of a baking powder which showed 21 per cent. of Rochelle salts. The baking powder was not fresh, and because of the improper manner in which it had been made the ingredients had combined, forming the purgative salt. I give this as an illustration of those baking powders whose keeping qualities are sacrificed to present strength. How to get both strength and keeping quality is the secret of baking powder success."

"Doctor, what about ammonia in baking powder?"

"Sesqui-carbonate of ammonia is sometimes used in the higher class of baking powders."

"Is it injurious or objectionable?"

"Nonsense! Quite the contrary. It has been used for generations in the finest food. It is a very volatile agent. Heat entirely evolves it into gas, leaving no residuum. Were it used in sufficient quantity to do the entire work of aeration, I am inclined to believe it would be the acme of leavening agents. Some of the highest authorities, as Hassall, recommend its exclusive use for this purpose in preference to yeast or other kinds of leaven. It is universally admitted to be a wholesome and valuable agent, and no chemist of reputation will class it otherwise. I have become indignant when I have read the silly charges that have frequently been made through ignorance or otherwise against it."

"Then those manufacturers who advertise that their powder does not contain it"—

"Confess that their powder lacks a most useful, wholesome and excellent ingredient."

"But they say its origin is filthy?"

"Its origin and method of preparation are no more filthy than are the origin and preparation of bread. All this talk about ammonia in baking powder and its filthy origin is the veriest rubbish. A man disgraces himself when he lends himself to any such statements. It is particularly unfair for baking powder manufacturers to seek to pervert the truth, or prejudice the ignorant or unwary by statements that it is either harmful or dirty. Ammonia exists in the very air we breathe, and is largely present in nature as a wholesome substance."

DEMAREST.—Suddenly, Nov. 27, Cornelius A. Demarest.

At a meeting of the Consistory of the Bergen Reformed Church, Jersey City, N. J., held Monday, Dec. 6, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, We have been called to part with our associate in office, Elder Cornelius A. Demarest, who died suddenly on the 27th day of last month.

Resolved, That we deeply deplore the loss of a beloved brother in Christ, and a faithful elder in the Church. He was worthy of double honor, because as an elder he ruled well.

Resolved, That we put on record our appreciation of the Christian character of our departed friend, and our firm confidence that he has gone from his earthly work to his heavenly reward.

Resolved, That we express our fraternal sympathy with the wife and daughter so sorely bereaved, and commend them to the "Father of the fatherless" and the "widows' God."

Resolved, That this minute be published in THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, and a copy sent to the afflicted family. CORNELIUS BRETT, JOEL W. BROWN, } Com.

GORDON.—At her late residence, 336½ Eighth street, Jersey City, Nov. 21, after a short illness, Minnie T. Osborn, beloved wife of George C. Gordon, aged 63 years. Interment at New Winsor, near Newburgh, N. Y.

A loving wife, a devoted Christian has entered into rest. The years of weakness and pain are ended. The strength and joy of life eternal have commenced. The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

JOHNS.—At Upper Red Hook, N. Y., Dec. 4, Mrs. Wm. Johns, in the 71st year of her age.

Deceased was the widow of Rev. Wm. Johns, at one time a minister of the Reformed Church, and settled at Prattsville, N. Y., 1855–59. Having associated herself in early life with this holy calling, she came to know its joys and its trials. Through these varied experiences she was sustained by the grace of her Saviour. The last years of her life were made burdensome by reason of a disease which terminated in her death. After some weeks of intense suffering she "fell on sleep" in the firm belief that "there remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God," and in the hope of entering into that rest. L.

The Church.

A Hymn of Penitence.

BY MARTIN LUTHER, A.D. 1524.

OUT of the depths I cry to Thee,
Lord God! Oh, hear my prayer!
Incline a gracious ear to me,
And bid me not despair:
If Thou rememberest each misdeed,
If each should have its rightful meed,
Lord, who shall stand before Thee?

Lord, through Thy love alone we gain
The pardon of our sin;
The strictest life is but in vain,
Our works can nothing win,
That none should boast himself of aught,
But own in fear Thy grace hath wrought
What in him seemeth righteousness.

Wherefore my hope is in the Lord,
My works I count but dust,
I build not there, but on His Word,
And in His goodness trust.
Up to His care myself I yield,
He is my tower, my rock, my shield,
And for His help I tarry.

And though it tarry till the night,
And round again to morn,
My heart shall ne'er mistrust Thy might,
Nor count itself forlorn.
Do thus, oh ye of Israel's seed,
Ye of the Spirit born indeed,
Wait for your God's appearing.

Though great our sins and sore our wounds,
And deep and dark our fall,
His helping mercy hath no bounds,
His love surpasseth all.
Our trusting, loving Shepherd, He
Who shall, at last, set Israel free
From all their sin and sorrow.

Moral Buttresses.

IN architecture a buttress is a projecting support to the exterior of a wall. When a perpendicular wall is expected to sustain the weight of a heavy roof, it either must be so thick as to be clumsy and very costly, or must be supported by outside props. Buttresses, which are built up against it at regular intervals, supply this necessary support, and also give a certain picturesqueness to the structure as a whole. They do not hold up the roof directly, but they contribute an important aid to its safety. They often seem to an uneducated eye to be merely ornamental, but really they have a genuine use.

There are many persons whose relation to the moral welfare and progress of the world appears to be only indirect, and whom some at times are disposed to censure on this account. Here, for instance, is a man who is a librarian, an antiquary, or a literary specialist of some other sort, who is buried in his books and pays little or no heed to anything else. He is a professor of religion, and in his quiet way he lives a useful and God-fearing life, but is absorbed in his work and does not respond to appeals in behalf of aggressive religious effort, and therefore is accounted discreditably lukewarm.

Here, again, is a woman, who has not even the excuse of absorption in a peculiar kind of labor. She is simply an ordinary wife and mother, busy with countless cares and weighted with heavy burdens. She, too, is a member of the church, and her humble life is not characterized by forgetfulness of her vows. Nevertheless, she rarely, if ever, attempts to do anything unusual in order to exert her Christian influence over her neighbors. She says that for special efforts, even for the sake of religion, the proper performance of her usual and God-given duties leaves her neither time nor strength; and, because she says this, some of her more ardent and less busy fellow-Christians are tempted to question the sincerity of her piety.

Now it may be that both he and she, whom we have just mentioned, are at fault. Possibly they might do more active work for Christ than they now do. But this is not certain, by any means, and it is nearly, or quite, impossible for anybody else to decide the point for them. So long as they respectively continue to live consistently Christian lives within their present spheres of usefulness, they should not be blamed for not seeking larger opportunities than they feel competent to use.

Is not more than this true, also? Are not such persons contributing an important, although an indirect, support to the structure of Christian purpose and effort which their more aggressive fellow-believers are trying to erect? More weight than we often give to it should be allowed to the truth that simple Christian fidelity, even though it be unostentatious, is a mighty power. True revivals are precious seasons, and wise revivalists do abundant good; yet, after all, a great part of the earthly strength of the Church of Christ is in the loyal living of its unassuming members. They are its buttresses, to say the least, and without them, humanly speaking, it could not stand.

In other words, those who do thoroughly well, in Christ's spirit and for His sake, the work in the world which He evidently has given them to do, are helping on the progress of His earthly kingdom as truly, if not as directly and as perceptibly, as any others. We cannot all be ministers and missionaries. God needs students, mechanics, sailors, hod-carriers, nurses, seamstresses, teachers, etc., as much as anybody else, and each of us is able to be a moral buttress, if not a part of the main wall itself.—The Congregationalist.

Cheerfulness.

THE other day, when the wind was hurtling eastward at forty miles an hour, when the stinging snow-pellets were discharging in cruel volleys, and the cold was momentarily increasing, a butcher's boy, seated in his open cart, went whistling through the streets as cheerily as a lark mounts to meet the sun. That warm-blooded boy fairly defied the tempest, and laughed at the rage of the storm. The little fellow was a sunbeam and a blessing to the whole street. His plucky notes rebuked the thermometer, and the very cold seemed abashed. Somehow, we kept thinking of him all day, and the remembered picture put a brighter glow into the atmosphere. A lump of ice reduces the temperature of warm water at a rate quite out of proportion to its mass. A crusty man, a cynical woman, or a cross child will disenchant, chill, and tangle an entire household. One cheery Christian inspires a whole church, while one bilious disciple modifies a Christian circle in the wrong direction. There is even cash value in a hopeful man. The child that rises first in the morning and fills the home with happy song to the echo of which the household wakens to duty, may determine the tone and trend of the day for all. The butcher who sent that happy boy through the streets the other day deserved the gratitude and custom of the whole ward. The clear whistle put the tempest to shame, and now, when the storm is over and almost forgotten, our juvenile prompter in cheerfulness is remembered.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

International Sunday-School Lesson.

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

December 26th.—Review of Fourth Quarter.

Introduction.

OUR lessons during the past quarter have presented to us one of the most impressive series of truths that could be gathered from the Bible. We have contemplated Jesus going deeper and deeper into the experience of sorrow and death for our sakes, and then emerging from that night of agony into the bright eternal day of His triumph. Notwithstanding the sharp contrasts between the circumstances of the earlier and later lessons, yet in all there is to be found the manifesting forth of the glory of the Redeemer. In reviewing these lessons we shall gather our thoughts about Jesus as the central figure, and seek a single suggestion from each lesson that may be profitable for us to remember.

I. JESUS THE MAN OF SORROWS.—LESSONS 1-4.

LESSON FIRST.—JESUS BETRAYED.—JOHN 18: 1-14.

"The Son of Man is betrayed into the hands of sinners."—Mark 14: 41.

In this lesson we see the treachery of Judas resulting in the arrest of Jesus in the garden. We note Jesus calm and yielding Himself to His enemies; Judas subtle and bold, yet soon to feel the pangs of remorse without hope.

LESSON SECOND.—JESUS BEFORE PILATE.—JOHN 18: 28-40.

"I find no fault in him."—John 18: 38.

The trial of Jesus before Pilate served to establish His innocence of all charges brought against Him, while it convicted the Jews of a blind, persistent hatred, and Pilate of weak vacillation and desire to strengthen himself at the expense of justice.

LESSON THIRD.—JESUS DELIVERED TO BE CRUCIFIED.—JOHN 19: 16.

"Then delivered he him, therefore, unto them to be crucified." John 19: 16.

After Pilate had determined to surrender his convictions of duty to an endeavor to purchase the favor of the Jews who hated and feared him, he allowed his soldiers to treat the prisoner with the utmost cruelty and insult permitted by the Roman law and practice. It was at their hands that He received His crown of thorns.

LESSON FOURTH.—JESUS CRUCIFIED.—JOHN 19: 17-30.

"It is finished."—John 19: 30.

The Cross is the centre of Christianity, and the sufferings of Jesus upon the tree must always touch the hearts of those who love Him. About the cross we see the thoughtless soldiers, the mocking multitudes, the weeping disciples. From the cross we hear the words of pardon, sympathy, agony and triumph.

II. JESUS THE LORD OF LIFE.—LESSONS 5-8.

LESSON FIFTH.—JESUS RISEN.—JOHN 20: 1-18.

"The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon.—Luke 24-34.

When we think about the resurrection we naturally associate with that event the revelation of Jesus to Mary as the most interesting episode connected with that event. She had gone early to the sepulchre to complete the embalming that had been interrupted by the sudden coming of the Sabbath. She had been amazed at finding the tomb empty, and the words of the angels had only served to increase the mystery. The manner in which Jesus manifested Himself to her, by a word, intimates how He speaks to each of His followers, who knows His voice.

LESSON SIXTH.—THOMAS CONVINCED.—JOHN 21: 19-31.

"And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord, and my God."—John 20: 28.

We always think of Thomas as the doubter, but none of the disciples believed in the report of the resurrection; they all demanded personal knowledge of the fact. Thomas differs from the rest in that he demanded more of sensible evidence, and refused to accept a greater body of evidence than did his companions. When his faith was awakened, it immediately rose to a more sublime height than that of the rest.

LESSON SEVENTH.—PETER RESTORED.—JOHN 21: 4-19.

"He saith unto him, Feed my lambs."—John 21: 15.

The work of Jesus during the interval between His resurrection and ascension appears to have been intended especially for the preparation of His disciples for their work. It is not probable that we have any more than samples of His teachings during this time. In the scene at the Sea of Galilee, He impressed all the company there assembled with the magnitude and success of their work as fishers of men, and fully reinstated Peter into the position which he had forfeited by his repeated denials.

LESSON EIGHTH.—WALKING IN THE LIGHT.—1 JOHN 1: 5-26.

"If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 John 1: 7.

In this lesson we have sketched the disciple in his daily life, as the representative of Jesus on earth. The nature of the Christian life as walking in the light, and so imitating Jesus, is graphically set forth, and we are warned against a form of godliness without power.

III. JESUS THE KING OF GLORY.—LESSONS 9-12.

LESSON NINTH.—JOHN'S VISION OF CHRIST.—REV. 1: 1-18.

"I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore."—Rev. 1: 18.

From the Gospel according to John we pass to the Apocalypse or Manifestation of Jesus, which the beloved disciple was permitted to record. The book opens with a vision of the King in His beauty, that we might contemplate Jesus as relieved forever of all the limitations and humiliations incident to His life on earth.

LESSON TENTH.—WORSHIPPING GOD AND THE LAMB.—REV. 5: 1-14.

"Blessing and honor, and glory and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." –Rev. 5: 13.

This scene represents Jesus as the centre of the heavenly host, sharing their glad adoration with the Father, and so placed on an equality with the Father. These who unite in His praise are the representatives of all orders of spiritual creatures.

LESSON ELEVENTH.—THE SAINTS IN HEAVEN.—REV. 7: 9-17.

"Therefore are they before the throne, and serve him day and night."—Rev. 7: 11.

As our heaven would not be complete without the presence of our Redeemer, so His heaven is not complete without the presence of those for whom He died. They will be gathered from every land, but will all appear as those who have washed their robes, and have thus been made worthy to stand before the great white throne.

LESSON TWELFTH.—THE GREAT INVITATION.—REV. 22: 8-21.

"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."—Rev. 22: 21.

The last message of revelation is a gracious invitation, as broad as human need, while its closing verse is a benediction. Many teachers and scholars have now completed a course running through the Bible, and touching upon all the more important points. Let us ask ourselves, Has this study taught me my need of Christ and brought me nearer to Him? If not, these privileges must appear for our condemnation, because knowing our Lord's will we have not done it.

Central Truths.

1. The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?
2. He was despised and rejected of men.
3. He was wounded for our transgressions.
4. The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin.
5. It is Christ that died; yea, rather that is risen again.
6. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.
7. If ye love Me keep My commandments.
8. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.
9. Because I live, ye shall live also.
10. I and my Father are one.
11. We know that when He shall appear we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is.
12. WHOSOEVER WILL, LET HIM TAKE OF THE WATER OF LIFE FREELY.

Life.

LIFE is like a crooked railroad;
And the engineer is brave
Who can make a trip successful
From the cradle to the grave.

There are stations all along it,
Where at almost any breath,
You'll be "flagged" to stop your engine
By the messenger of death.

You may run the grades of trouble
Many days and years with ease,
But time may have you "side-tracked"
By the switchman of disease.

You may cross the bridge of manhood,
Run a tunnel long, of strife,
Having God for your conductor,
On the lightning train of life.

Always mindful of instructions,
On duty never turn your back;
Keep your hand upon the throttle,
And your eye upon the track.

The Babe Rama.

RAMA is the hero of the Sanskrit epic poem, "The Ramayana." His father was a god and his mother a Ranee or queen. This is how he cried for the moon in his childhood and how he was pacified:

And Rama was a very lovely babe, and as he slept in a white cot he appeared like a blue lotos floating upon the waters of the Ganges. When Rama was sufficiently grown to run about he was the delight of his mother and the Maharaja. So it happened one evening the full moon arose in all its splendor and Rama felt a very strong desire to have the beautiful moon to play with for a toy. And he put out both his little hands toward the moon in order to obtain it; but his mother could not understand what he wanted, and thereupon he tried to beat her, and she asked him many times what he wished to have, and he continued to point to the moon, so that at last she came to understand what it was that he wanted, and she said to him: "Do not desire, O, my child, to possess the moon, because it is a thousand miles off, and it is not a plaything for children and no child ever got it. If you wish I will bring you some jewels that are brighter than the moon, and you can play with them."

So saying she brought some beautiful jewels and placed them before the little boy; but Rama threw them away in anger and began to cry until his eyes grew red and swollen with weeping. Now by this time a number of women were gathered around him, but no one could console him. One said, "Perhaps he is hungry;" but he refused to take any food. Another said, "Perchance he is sleepy," and she took him on her lap and sung him the lullaby; but she could not quiet him, and he still continued to cry. Then one of the women said, "The goddess Susti has become unpropitious and must be propitiated with offerings of curds, plantains and fried paddy!" Another said, "A ghost is troubling him; so send for a man who can repeat a verse and drive the ghost out."

But all these were of no effect and Rama was still unpacified as before. So the Ranee sent for the Maharaja; and when the Maharaja heard that Rama was ill, he came to him immediately and tried his utmost to console the child; but he could do no more than those who had tried before him; and Rama continued to cry and would not be comforted. Then the Maharaja sent for his chief counsellor of State and told him all that had happened; and when he heard that Rama was crying for the moon, he desired those about him to bring him a mirror. So a mirror was brought and placed in the hands of Rama, and when Rama saw the image of the moon in the mirror he was fully satisfied, and left off weeping, and was soon as merry as before, and the whole family were at ease.—The Sheltering Arms.

WE cannot rival God in power; the angels cannot; or in the measureless infinitude of His knowledge. But in that which is grander than power or knowledge in the character of sovereign and unspeakable glory, to which all else in him is subordinate, men are required by this religion to rival God; through perfect love to be as holy as Himself; as the single drop, in its crystal sphericity, is as perfect as oceans; as the single sun ray slanting through the crevice, is as perfect in its intrinsic splendor as measureless floods of solar effulgence. —Dr. R. S. Storrs.

THE essence of all sin is the forsaking of God. The essence of all misery is being forsaken of God. The essence of conversion is turning to God to forsake Him never. The essence of grace and glory is being never forsaken of God.—Dr. A. A. Bonar.

Rheumatism

We doubt if there is, or can be, a specific remedy for rheumatism; but thousands who have suffered its pains have been greatly benefited by Hood's Sarsaparilla. If you have failed to find relief, try this great remedy.

"I was afflicted with rheumatism twenty years. Previous to 1883 I found no relief, but grew worse, and at one time was almost helpless. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me more good than all the other medicine I ever had." H. T. BALCOM, Shirley Village, Mass.

"I had rheumatism three years, and got no relief till I took Hood's Sarsaparilla. It has done great things for me. I recommend it to others." LEWIS BURBANK, Biddeford, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

The Book of the Year.

Of all the beautiful fancies
That cluster about the year,
Tiptoeing over the threshold
When its earliest dawn is here,

The best is the simple legend
Of a book for you and me,
So fair that our guardian angels
Desire its lines to see.

Is full of the brightest pictures,
Of dream, and story, and rhyme,
And the whole wide world together
Turns only a page at a time.

Some of the leaves are dazzling
With the feather-flakes of the snow;
Some of them thrill to the music
Of the merriest winds that blow.

Some of them keep the secrets
That make the roses sweet;
Some of them sway and rustle
With the golden heads of wheat.

I cannot begin to tell you
Of the lovely things to be,
In the wonderful year-book waiting,
A gift for you and me.

And a thought most strange and solemn,
Is borne upon my mind,—
On every page a column
For ourselves we'll surely find.

Write what we may upon it,
The record there will stay,
Till the books of time are opened,
In the court of the Judgment Day.

And should we not be careful
Lest the words our fingers write
Shall rise to shame our faces
When we stand in the dear Lord's sight?

And should we not remember
To dread no thought of blame,
If we sign each page that we finish
With faith in the dear Lord's name?

—Mrs. M. E. Sangster, in Our Sunday Afternoon.

Serving the Master in a Boarding-House.

A DEVOTED Christian woman, advanced in years, at one time during her somewhat eventful life was employed to superintend a large boarding-house for factory operatives in a bustling New England manufacturing village. It was not a congenial situation at all, and she only accepted it because, at that time, nothing else available seemed to be at hand, and not only was it necessary, but she considered it her duty to be engaged in whatever useful employment offered itself.

"I shall be more content, and it will be in accord with both my duty and privilege if, at the same time, I am about my Master's business," she said, as she at once cast about in her mind to devise some means by which she might improve the moral and spiritual condition of the young working men and women now domiciled with her. So, on the very first Thursday night, at the tea-table, she announced that there would be a prayer-meeting in the sitting-room that evening, and on every Thursday evening thereafter while she remained in charge of the house. She cordially and affectionately invited all the boarders to attend.

The rather novel arrangement for a factory boarding-house in that locality was not regarded with any show of favor by the inmates, neither was it openly opposed. The meetings were not disturbed in any way, neither were they well attended at first, nor in any way encouraged. A faithful few from the neighborhood, especially two elderly maiden sisters, would come in and help carry on the meetings.

This boarding-house mistress accepted her new situation at New Year's, and this apparently indifferent state of things, as to the higher concerns of life among the giddy young people beneath her roof, continued through the winter. She was often tempted to declare to herself that she was well-nigh weary of well-doing, but as often, when Thursday night came round, she seemed to find strength and sweet encouragement from within to arrange her tidy rooms, to light her lamps, distribute her Bibles and hymn-books, and, when the hour arrived, to lead the little devotional meeting.

One morning, late in May, her employer, the superintendent of the mill, entered the roomy kitchen to tell her that she would be required to make room for a short time for two millwrights, who were coming from a distant town to make repairs on the mill. "They are respectable, intelligent men," said he, "and I thought they would be better off here than at the hotel, or at any other boarding-house in the village," and he withdrew.

She derived considerable encouragement from this somewhat indirect commendation of the administration of her house. When she came to it, its reputation was none of the best, and she felt that what improvement had been made in its management was largely due to the religious tone given it by these meetings.

The two millwrights came in due time, and proved to be quiet, sensible, gentlemanly men—quite superior to her regular boarders in breeding and demeanor. It seemed to her that these refined and skilled mechanics were representatives from the outside polite world to which she had always been accustomed, and now, more than ever, it grated upon her sensibilities to think that she was environed in that rough boarding-house.

From the very first evening they were in the house, she began to dread the approaching hour for the prayer-meeting, and, strange to say, found herself devising means for postponing it. It seemed to her that she could never find courage to raise her voice in Scriptural reading, in prayer, in exhortation before those men. Very likely she might be overrating them; but perhaps it was not singular, she had so long been shut in from all cultivated society. All the long day, Thursday, she conned over in her mind what she should say in the little meeting—not for God's acceptance, but for theirs, that they might be duly impressed with the fact that she was superior to her surroundings.

She was glad, therefore, when they came in to tea, after their day's work, to hear them say they were going out for a walk, up the river, to look at a proposed mill-site, at the request of the superintendent. She felt it to be her duty to tell them there would be a prayer-meeting in the house at 7 o'clock, but she could not bring herself to say it. And so they went away, leaving her with the remorseful thought that she had added another to the long list of neglected opportunities, which many conscientious Christians, I suppose, see accumulating, during their lives, with regret.

After they were gone, she arranged her rooms with a feeling of relief, mingled with the regretful memory of neglected duty, that they were not to be present; and when the hour for meeting arrived, she glanced around and saw with satisfaction that they had not returned. She led the exercises as usual, and in her opening prayer the indwelling Spirit did not suffer her to forget the strangers who were now sojourning under her roof.

It was a balmy evening. The sitting-room windows were open, and as she knelt with bowed head, she noticed that the perfume of the sweet-brier, which grew luxuriantly in the little plot in front of the house near the windows, stole in and pervaded the room like delightful incense. As she closed, her petition was continued by a deep voice, which she instantly recognized as that of the elder of the new boarders, and she soon found by his earnest and touchingly suggestive words that he had long been in the habit of praying for himself, without the comforting assurance that his prayers were heard at the throne of grace. He had for some time been anxious to have some Christian believer pray for him, but he had not dared to make the request. Now he felt that these joint petitions were heard.

When she rose from her knees, she saw that the speaker was leaning in one of the open windows, from the outside, with his elbows upon the sill, and the tall, graceful, tender-leaved, sweet-brier forming a wreath about his uncovered head. Immediately the other millwright came forward from the hall, and, standing in the doorway, said he had started in the Christian race years before, but he had strayed from the heavenly path. The boarding-house mistress's earnest tones in prayer for him had made the fact of his spiritual declension seem more real and appalling than ever before. "I implore you all to pray for me," said he, in trembling tones, "that I may again take the Master's hand in mine, and with a loving, abiding faith, walk bravely along in the Christian course."

At that, one after another of her old boarders, who had come into the meeting that night in greater numbers than usual, told, with tearful faces and earnest voices, how they had long been convicted of sin and were anxious to embrace the Saviour, if only they might find Him. Week after week, each had secretly hoped that one or another of their number would break the ice by requesting prayer or religious conversation.

So a precious revival was begun in the village of W——, which, it may be truthfully said, is still going on, for a Sabbath-school was immediately organized, then a church, and the religious interest centered there has always been kept in a fervent glow, and it is nearly eight years from the present writing since those little meetings were first held.

"Thus I came to see," said the good woman, in telling her story, "that the life I thought was so uncongenial was a blessed life, as all is when we are made instruments in God's hands for doing His work. So I came to praise Him for having sent me to W——, when I heard others praising Him for having put it into my heart to brighten up and endear for all time that dingy boarding-house sitting-room with those services of prayer and praise."—Selected.

A Nest in a Pocket.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

A LITTLE bird we Once in the nes
And sought for shelte
Until, for some que
She flew into a granai
Where, on a nail su
The farmer's coat she
And there her seare

The granary was in a
Where not a creature else her,
The coat had hollows deep and soft—
Could anything be better?
And where it hung, how safe it was,
Without a breeze to rock it!
Come, little busy beak and claws,
Build quick inside the pocket!

Three speckled eggs soon warmly lay
Beneath the happy sitter;
Three little birds—O joy!—one day
Began to chirp and twitter.
Until—ah, can you guess the tale?
The farmer came one morning,
And took his coat down from the nail
Without a word of warning.

Poor little frightened motherling!
Up from her nest she fluttered,
And straightway every gaping thing
Its wide-mouthed terror uttered.
The good man started back aghast;
But merry was his wonder
When in the pocket he at last
Found such unlooked-for plunder.

He put the coat back carefully:
"I guess I have another;
So don't you be afraid of me,
You bright eyed little mother.
I know just how you feel, poor thing,
For I have youngsters, bless you!
There—stop your foolish fluttering—
Nobody shall distress you."

Then merrily he ran away
To tell his wife about it—
How in his coat the nestling lay,
And he must do without it.
She laughed, and said she thought he could?
And so, all unmolested,
The mother-birdie and her brood
Safe in the pocket rested,

Till all the little wings were set
In proper flying feather,
And then there was a nest to let—
For off they flocked together.
The farmer keeps it still to show,
And says that he's the debtor;
His coat is none the worse, you know,
While he's—a little better.

—Christmas St. Nicholas.

Not Self, but Christ.

THERE is more pulp than pluck in a great deal of what passes for piety. It is an audacious attempt to get a free ride to heaven in a drawing-room car, with plenty of select company and good fare on the road. "Will Dr. A—— be in his pulpit to-day? Will the music be up to the mark? Is it likely to clear off? Then I'll try to go to church to-day." With such a soliloquy on Sabbath morning, how much grace is there likely to be left after the wear and tear of the week?

The piety that Christ smiles upon, is a piety that will stand a pinch and face a storm; that would rather eat an honest crust, than fare sumptuously on unholy gains; that gladly gives up its couch of ease to sally off on its mission among the outcasts; that sets its Puritan face like a flint against fashionable sins. We talk glibly about "taking up a cross," but a cross is intended for somebody's crucifixion. On Calvary's Cross we know full well WHO bled away His precious life. On our cross, self is to be the victim. Paul the heroic was emphasizing this fact when he commanded Christians to mortify their members which are upon the earth. The American Revision of the New Testament hits the sense of this passage more accurately: "Put to death your own members," etc. Loyalty to Christ often demands the plucking out of the right eye, and the amputation of the right arm. The sublime glory of Abraham's offering, really was that he was willing to thrust the knife through the very heart of self. O it is not the taking up; it is the giving up that makes a strong, athletic, heroic Christian.—Theodore L. Cuyler, D.D., in The Evangelist.

To the Children.

DEAR CHILDREN: How would you like to run barefooted through the snow of the street, and sell your newspapers under the cutting wind of winter, and go home at night to sleep in a box, under a stairway, or on a pile of rags in a cellar? How would you like to go to sleep in this way at night, and think that in a whole city-full, there was not one person who cared for you? How would you like to see other children around bright fires, or in warm rooms, getting their presents, or sitting at the Christmas dinner, and you out in the cold, hungry, and shivering, and half clad, and without a friend?

Now, on Christmas day, we want you to think of the poor children, boys and girls in New York, who are in this way, and see if you can do something for them.

We want to make a Christmas present of a home to the homeless ones.

It will cost a good deal—$20.00; but perhaps you will give a part, and your father make it up, and send the whole in a check to us.

Then some day you will be glad that you gave the best Christmas gift that could be, and helped to save a little boy or girl from poverty, and from growing up a thief or a vagabond.

Yours affectionately,
C. L. BRACE, SECRETARY.

Delightful Illustrated Lectures.

Seldom is an opportunity afforded the people of this city to listen to so thoroughly an enjoyable series of lectures on famous places, in this and other countries, as is now being given at Steinway Hall by that deservedly popular lecturer, Mr. H. H. Ragan; and we, therefore, suggest the advisability of hearing the two remaining lectures soon to be delivered. The lecture of last Saturday evening, "A Tour Through Old Mexico with a Camera," was illustrated with some seventy superior dissolving views, which added much interest to Mr. Ragan's graphic description of the journey.

INDIGESTION, DYSPEPSIA, nervous prostration, and all forms of general debility relieved by taking Mensman's Peptonized Beef Tonic, the only preparation of beef containing its entire nutritious properties. It is not a mere stimulant like the extracts of beef, but contains blood-making, force-generating, and life-sustaining properties; is invaluable in all enfeebled conditions, whether the result of exhaustion, nervous prostration, overwork, or acute disease; particularly when resulting from pulmonary complaints. BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 27,746 pks.; exports, 1,998 pks.

There is a good demand for fancy last week's make of choicest Eastern or Western creamery butter at 30a31c., with a possible 32c., and also for a crisp, high-flavored dairy October make at 25a26c., with a possible 27c. for super-extra. Winter make N. Y. State creamery is in liberal stock, and is offered at all kinds of prices, say 23a28c., and sells only in a small way. We note sales of a few fancy Delaware dairies at 23a24c., and good to fine Chenango and Cortland dairies at 20a22c.; also late make butter in half firkins and Welsh tubs at 20a22c., and some lots of early and fairish winter makes State butter at 15a18c. All kinds of fresh make Western of good to fair qualities have had good enquiry at full prices, and are taken in preference to good sound N. Y. State dairies at the same price. Low grades of butter, worth say 10a13c., are in quick demand, and our market closes well cleared of this kind of stock. Summer make Western creamery, held through the season in cold storage, and ordinary dairies of N. Y. State butter have had very little sale, and prices are easier and irregular. We quote:

CHEESE.—Receipts for the week, 13,273 boxes; exports, 4,730 boxes.

Fancy cheese are held at 12¾a13c., and selling only in a small way to home trade. Exporters are taking fair to good full creams at 12a12¼c., night milk skims at 8a10c., and full skim State factories at 5a7c. Pennsylvania skims are not so plentiful this week, and sold readily at 3a4c. Market closes firm for all kinds. We quote:

THE POOR.—No Christmas is complete in which we forget the claims of the poor. Thinking over those who have relations with our households, there are always some to whom we may send a portion from our greater affluence; the more delicately the better. Not the children of our laundress or our seamstress only, but the reduced gentlewoman whose poverty is hidden under a cloak of pride, the needy student who is enduring privations bravely that he may gain the education he craves, the widow and the orphan who shrink from the general joy should be lovingly remembered in the Christmas-tide.

THE PICTURE of Longfellow seated by the table on which his delightful works were written, amid his books, surrounded by articles useful and decorative around which cluster many precious associations, is a really handsome engraving and would be an ornament to any library. It is offered by The Christian Intelligencer as a remuneration to any subscriber who will secure a new subscriber, on terms mentioned in another column. At this time of the year many of the ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church make a common effort to procure the renewal of subscriptions and an addition of new subscribers for the Christian Advocates published in the interest of that Church. This has been the custom of years. Experience has abundantly proved it to be a wise policy. The result is the papers have a large circulation, are well-provided with means to procure valuable treatises and letters from the most competent men and women and to encourage young writers of promise, and themselves become more and more useful, valuable and attractive year by year. The engraving of Longfellow is offered by us as an incentive to such an endeavor among ourselves.

THE BILL providing for the allotment of land in severalty to the Indians passed the House of Representatives last week, reports say with amendments comparatively unimportant. It now goes before a conference committee of the House and Senate, with the expectation that an agreement will soon be reached. The bill is simply a necessity, the one thing to do to secure homes for the Indians. The reservations cannot be preserved unless the government can maintain a small army on each one to bear back the tide of emigration. Such an arrangement would result in a series of conflicts, continued at a large expense, and a state of disquietude hindering the development of the surrounding country and increasing the difficulties attendant upon the education and civilization of the wards of the nation. We hope that the amendments to the bill made in the House are really of minor importance. In this matter nothing can be done without legislation, and nothing can be done but that authorized by legislation. Therefore, it is of the highest importance that the law be wise and just, allowing no opportunity for oppression or robbery.

THE DUTCH FATHERS.—The Rev. Daniel Van Pelt, on Tuesday evening of last week, lectured by invitation of the Long Island Historical Society before a good audience in the Hall of the Society, on Our Dutch Fathers. The main theme of the lecture sprang out of the fact that the Dutch emigration to the New World began at the beginning of the Golden era of Dutch history, and was animated by the spirit which produced that era. The eminence attained by the Dutch Republic as a commercial people, planting colonies in America, Asia, Africa and on many islands; as a maritime power, long the rival of England; in art, as exhibited by the Dutch painters; in learning and literature—Grotius, Spinoza, and others being presented as examples, was described with clearness and force. Reasons were given for the subsequent decline of Holland and for the present subordinate position of the nation, the chief reason being the establishment of a monarchial government. The lecture was heard with attention and evident interest. Judge Van Cott moved the thanks of the Society in terms strongly complimentary and the seconder added that Mr. Van Pelt be requested to lecture again. As his engagements will allow, Mr. Van Pelt is willing to repeat the lecture before other societies.

DISCOURSES, directly or indirectly answering and refuting the assaults of scepticism upon the Old Testament, bringing forward the confirmation the historical portions of the early Scriptures have received from the researches and discoveries of the past twenty-five years in Oriental countries, interpreting obscure passages and giving aid to the understanding of the ancient Scriptures, have been recently or are to be delivered in this city or vicinity. Dr. Lansing, of our Seminary in New Brunswick, in evening discourses delivered, during the illness of Dr. Coe, in the church on Fifth avenue and Forty-eighth street, has brought illustration and proof of the Sacred Records from the monuments of Egypt. Dr. Robinson in the Presbyterian Memorial Church, has confirmed and explained the Scriptures from the treasures of Egyptology and Assyriology in a series of Sabbath evening lectures, which have attracted large audiences. Next Sabbath Dr. Howard Crosby begins in his church on the Fourth avenue, a series of evening sermons on "The Nations with Whom the Hebrews Came in Contact." Very certainly one so familiar with the records of the Eastern empires, as they are found on the monuments and in the works of Greek historians, will show how remarkably the Old Testament Scriptures are confirmed not only in statements made at length but in incidental historical allusions. In addition to these valuable discourses in this city, Brooklyn is to have the privilege of listening to two lectures by Sir William Dawson, of Montreal, the eminent Christian geologist and President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, who will speak on The Development of the Divine Plan in the Physical History of the Earth and its Preparation for Man. These lectures will be delivered on the first two Sabbath evenings of January. They are provided for by the will of the late Augustus Graham, which contains a bequest to secure Sunday evening lectures, during the winter months, on the power, wisdom and goodness of God, as manifested in His works. Cards of admission to these lectures can be obtained without charge of the Brooklyn Institute, the Historical Society, Mercantile Library, Packer, Polytechnic and Adelphi Institutes. The record of creation in Genesis will receive strong scientific support. Such a bringing forward of the evidence which confirms the Old Testament is timely and necessary; should relieve the faith of Christians from the shocks it may have received from the assaults which have been made on the Old Testament for some years past, and should convince many who have become involved in doubts by the persistent assertions that the credibility of the older books of the Bible has become questionable.

Christmas, A.D. I and 1886.

THE observance of Christmas in 1886 as a commemoration of the birth of Jesus the Christ presents a very strong contrast with the circumstances of the event it celebrates. In one of the least of the cities of Judah, a poor woman, in the stable of the inn, gives birth to a son. Her nation was a conquered one, and, but for the location of the territory it occupied, would have been considered one of small importance. During a long life it had been wealthy and powerful only during the reigns of David and Solomon. Of literature it had only one book. In art and architecture it had produced nothing worthy of comparison with the works of surrounding empires. The temple at Jerusalem had been built by a man of Tyre. More than the half of the nation had been carried into captivity and disappeared. The remnant, subjected by the Romans, seemed to have reached the closing period of national existence and to be destined to be absorbed, as had occurred with others, by more powerful and warlike peoples. Except to a very few persons, the birth of a son of a carpenter's wife, in a small town, was an insignificant event. In impressive contrast with these facts is the celebration of that birth this week by social and religious assemblies around the whole world. Instead of a small company of wondering shepherds and three worshipping wise men of the East, millions of men of many nations will thankfully adore the Son of God and Son of Man and give to Him the love and confidence of their hearts as they will to no other. The child of Bethlehem will be esteemed the hope of the world. Men will confidently look to Him to establish in due time in all the earth the reign of truth, righteousness, mercy and peace. The angels, in their adoration, had proclaimed the babe of Bethlehem to be "Christ the Lord." Nothing then, to the wise and prudent of this world, seemed more improbable. It was incredible that the child of a carpenter's wife, of a small and weak nation, a nation apparently worn out and decaying, a child cradled in a manger, would become the royal Redeemer of the world. But to-day it is no longer improbable or incredible. To-day millions of men with undoubting confidence anticipate the day when every knee shall bow before Him and every tongue confess Him Lord. To-day the mightiest name known among men is Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The birth of Christ is now celebrated by a world wonderfully transformed. It is transformed in character. By the words, the example, the grace of Jesus Christ, through faith in His name, thousands of thousands of men have become new creatures, hungering and thirsting after righteousness, loving mercy and truth, and, by virtue of their Christianity, living such holy and beneficent lives as have been lived by the disciples of no other religious leader the world has known.

Before the Gospel of Christ debasing idolatries and superstitions have passed away. Men have learned to worship and serve a God who is a spirit, eternal, almighty, all-wise, holy, righteous, and full of love and grace. Millions of men instead of degrading the Creator to the image of corruptible man, and birds, and beasts, and four-footed and creeping things, now glorify Him as God, infinite in moral perfection. They vie with each other in making Him great in the intellectual and moral attributes which through the Spirit of Christ they have learned constitute true greatness. The light of the knowledge of the glory of God shines into the hearts of men from the face of Jesus Christ, and men are changed into the same image from glory unto glory.

The highest, noblest character the world has known has been produced by faith in Jesus Christ. It is found in the cottage and the palace; it is refined, purified, strengthened, perfected by temptation and trial; it triumphs over persecution, suffering and death, and above every other character has a promise of life in the world to come.

The world which this week commemorates the birth of Christ is transformed in intelligence. Christ is the light of the world. His followers, under His command, "Go, teach all nations," learned to plant the school by the side of the Church and to welcome the children of all classes within its doors, until the privileges of a useful education have become the common property of men of all conditions. Useful knowledge has been supplied under the influence of the Gospel as never before. The secrets of nature have been discovered; speculation has been displaced by facts and principles educed from them, and true knowledge, such knowledge as was never before possessed, runs to and fro upon the earth.

The world under the Gospel of Christ has also become a liberated world. Despotism and tyranny have been supplanted by representative governments, chosen by the people. The will of one man, of an oligarchy, an aristocracy, has been displaced by constitutions and laws framed by agents selected by all the people. Serfdom has been banished from civilized nations and is in progress of extinction. Individual responsibility is more and more acknowledged; and the right of a man to be his own master so far as the rights of all other men will allow, and to reap the fruit of his labor, in order that he may discharge individual responsibility, is more and more recognized. The sentence has gone forth, "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren," and is extending its sway.

By the rule of Jesus Christ the world is a better world in every way. It is a world of homes, homes of such comfort and wholesome enjoyment as the world of eighteen hundred years ago did not and could not imagine. In these homes by old and young the birth of the Christ will be celebrated with thankful joy. The children will learn to love Him the world over, until He will be acknowledged everywhere as "Christ the Lord," and the foretaste and earnest of the heavenly kingdom be enjoyed by an innumerable multitude.

CALVINISM.—Some one writing to a daily paper of this city affirms that the teachings of this system are thus summarized in page 108 of a very able book published in Glasgow in 1856, entitled, "Calvinism in its Relations to Scripture and Reason:" "The formularies of Calvinism teach that God punishes His own creatures with eternal torments because they fail to do that which His own decree has made impossible for them, and because they do those things which He Himself had from eternity determined and ordained them to do."

In regard to this it may be truly said that no Calvinist ever held such a doctrine, and no "formulary" can be quoted which holds it. The truth which Paul, Augustine, Calvin, and all their followers maintain on the subject of eternal punishment is that it is the wages of sin, and that men are punished because they are sinners, and for no other reason. They who assert otherwise, whether orally or in print, simply bear false witness against their neighbor.

"Old Colony" Papers.

"Christmas Comes but Once a Year."

THIS familiar expression is usually spoken with a sigh, if not as a half-complaint,—

"The masquer's face dimmed with a tear,
For Christmas comes but once a year."

But I am inclined to regard this fact as one of the best things about the festival. And although Christmas and logic-chopping are rather incongruous (the "Abbot of Unreason" being understood to be the chaplain, as the "Lord of Misrule" is the generalissimo, of the occasion) it would not be difficult to show substantial reasons for it.

It is a good thing for Christmas itself. It doesn't do to make one's self common. No man can be a hero to his valet, we are assured,—though, as most of us cannot afford a valet and would not care to be bothered with one, we have had no means of testing our heroic qualities in that way. I am quite sure that if old Christmas came two or three times a year, his pippin face and frosty beard and odd figure would not be surrounded by the same halo of superstitious veneration. Familiarity might not breed contempt (the thought were profanity), but his grotesque personality and excessive flow of spirits would display themselves more conspicuously through his venerable appearance, like the man in the moon or the o'er-jumping cow, when that luminary is too closely observed; so that our revered Saint Nicholas might come to have no more dignity than Mr. Punch.

Moreover, Christmas is a cult. And the only objection that I know of to a liturgy—and it is a very serious objection—is its tendency to grow somewhat threadbare by much repetition, or at least to become so smoothed by usage as to lose its point and prick to our minds as we repeat it. I well remember my consternation, when a student-preacher, at the crashing fall of the big Bible from the desk, one Sunday as I was supplying a Fifth avenue pulpit. This catastrophe arose from the fact that the plush of the cushion had become so sleek and slippery as to tempt the book to a coasting expedition. I am afraid that it would be down-hill with Christmas too, especially in the religious observance of our churches, if it came more than once a year. Certainly it would not so take hold of our hearts, and warm them up by a generous friction, as now.

And I think that old sled of his might come down our chimneys once too often, if it came more than once a year. It were vain to expect the Christmas tree, this side of the river of life, to not only bear all manner of fruit but to yield its fruit every month, or even every six months. The result would be that the stockings would either be only half full, or (horrible thought!) the gift business would go into bankruptcy and fall into disuse altogether. But now that noble tree is a whole year ripening. Its buds begin to peep into our thoughts quite early in the spring. It blossoms into plans and purchases, all through the summer and autumn. We generally pluck the fruit green, like pears, and lay them away in cotton to mellow for the little ones. In fact, the Christmas tree is an evergreen in our homes and hearts.

But I am very much afraid that even Santa Claus would come to be regarded as the tax collector or the book-agent, if he came too often to us old folks, especially as he makes now so many other calls, not only in behalf of the nursery but of the Sunday-school and the mission school, and our giving of portions to six and also to seven. Then, too, we more and more incline to birthday presents all around; and wedding presents are ever before us. Which is all very delightful and, like mercy, "blesses him that gives and him that takes." But as even civil service reform, or the boom in the stock market, has not yet provided us all with Fortunatus' purses, there is a limit to our supply of the beatific demand.

And it is well for the children that Christmas comes but once a year, for the same reason. A half loaf may be better than no bread, but two half loaves of cake will neither impress the imagination nor satisfy the juvenile stomach like the whole, rounded loaf with its frosting unbroken and its rich interior uncut and uncrumbled. When Jack Horner sat in his memorable corner, think you he would have put in his thumb with the same proud and gustful satisfaction if, instead of a Christmas pie in a lordly dish, he had been obliged to sit down with a triangular "piece," of however obtuse an angle, on a plate? "'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view" of other things besides mountains. There is a cumulative prestige to a feast of fat things which comes to us (or rather, which we come to) only at the interval of twelve months. And that rich and redundant feast itself, the pie, the cake, the goose, the sage and onions, the nuts and apples, and all the rest! We poor Americans are dyspeptic enough now, without subjecting our youthful stomachs to any more frequent carnivals of gorging.

And, by the way, is it not a good thing for the goose (I mean the one which is eaten), that Christmas comes but once a year. We all know what desolation reigns over our poultry yards, and along the fences and the low boughs of the trees on all the countryside, when the annual Thanksgiving has come and gone, so that it takes the exhausted empire of turkey a whole year to recruit its energies. And what a dead sea would soon be every pond and puddle now enlivened and whitened by the graceful and gliding forms of mother goose and goosey gander, if the Herodian decree should go forth more than once a year for the slaughter of the innocents.

The once-a-yearness of Christmas is, finally, a good thing for the public morals. It may be that, taking the year together, we have not too many holidays. But we certainly have enough during the period from the first of November to the first of March, with its Election Day, Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's and Washington's Birthday. If a holiday meant rest and recreation, this congestion of holidays might not affect injuriously the body politic. But the hard, stern fact is that to multitudes of people, especially of the "labor" class, it means the most exhausting kind of unrest, and with a sad proportion of them a dissipation which casts its shadow of deterioration, both physical and moral, over succeeding days. Employers of labor, especially in certain industries which are absolutely dependent upon the regularity of employees, are obliged to take account of and make provision for this in their plans. Perhaps the wise and prudent should not be made to suffer for the sake of the prodigal and profligate, but there is no danger that those who properly spend the holidays and Sabbaths which they already have will feel the lack of more. In fact, the earnings of this class are none too large now, and every day's wages which has to be dispensed with makes the comforts of the remaining days of the toiling year more scanty.

But while the outward celebration is confined to a single bright and chiming day in all the long twelvemonth, let us thank God that the great and glad event which it commemorates comes not once a year, but came "once for all," and beautifies and cheers the hearts of poor and rich, old and young, through the whole three hundred and sixty-five days, and casts its glory over the eternal years. Old Christmas is ever young, and its Gospel of infinite grace is always in our hearts and in our lives, making every day a private and a family festival, a fresh reception of an "unspeakable gift" which is "new every morning and constant as the movements of our life." Shall we not all so spend this eighteen hundred and eighty-sixth Christmas day, as to go forth from it with a deeper sense of the Incarnate Mystery as the pre-eminent fact which gives significance to our lives and should determine their spirit and aims? Then shall our Christmas be "merry" indeed, not with a transient effervescence of animal spirits like the bead and sparkle of a wine glass, but with that "holy mirth" which is a "continual feast."

PRINCETON, N. J., December 15th, 1886.

Prepare His Way.

PREPARE ye the way of the Lord!
In Bethlehem, prepare for His birth:
A bed, in a manger, accord,
He wants not the pomp of the earth.
O, glory of God shine around;
Ye shepherds make haste to your king;
O, skies with His praises resound;
Ye star-led your rich tribute bring.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord,
In Naz'reth prepare Him a home.
He stoopeth, by angels adored,
The carpenter's son to become.
As Thou wast obedient and mild,
Increasing in wisdom and grace,
O grant Thou, to each little child,
The light of Thy pure, blessed face.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord
That leadeth to Calvary's tree;
And place there, with nail and with cord,
The captive whose bonds set us free.
The sun seeks in darkness relief;
The temple-veil parts, rent in twain;
The earth trembles sore at His grief;
The rocks feel the throbs of His pain.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord.
The Judge of the earth is at hand,
Who calleth the dead by a word
Before Him in judgment to stand.
O Saviour, who comest enthroned,
Still with Thy great tenderness spare;
As Thou for our sins hast atoned,
Regard Thou our penitent prayer.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord,
Who leadeth His glorified throng.
Make ready each sweet, tuneful chord,
Prepare ye to sing the new song.
He cometh, whom heaven awaits,
He cometh in kingly array:
Lift up ye your heads, O ye gates!
Ye doors everlasting give way!

International Lesson Helps.

THE Sunday-School Times has engaged an unequalled corps of devout scholars to write upon the lessons of 1887. The company includes men who rank among the highest authorities upon Biblical themes in this country and Europe. The Times has been prompted to engage such expositors because the lessons are from the Old Testament which has been so persistently and cunningly assailed during the past twenty years. The numbers of the journal will be of the greatest value, not only to those exgaged in the Sabbath-schools, but to all who wish trustworthy information in regard to the much controverted contents of the Old Testament. The Sunday-School Times deserves a large addition to its circulation for the enterprise and courage which have led it to venture upon the outlay of money, without which such an undertaking cannot be carried through. There is no probability that the same amount of information of the very highest value on the subjects of the lessons will be obtained at any price from any other journal. The Times costs $2 a year.

From those who have used them during the past year we hear only hearty commendation of the Westminster Teacher, published by the Presbyterian Board of Publication, and The Sunday-School World, published by the American Sunday-School Union. Each is a monthly and costs 60 cents a year. We hear it said frequently of one or the other, "I cannot do without it I am lost without it."

Peloubet's Series, consisting of quarterlies for teachers and pupils of all ages, has many warm friends. The expositions have taken a wider range, have been rounded out more and more year by year, as experience has indicated desirable additions. The "Select Notes," the volume of expositions and practical applications, is better than ever by the addition of new features. All the Peloubet lesson books are excellent.

The Pocket Lesson Books, prepared by the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Crafts, while containing all needful explanations, enforcements and helps, are especially desirable on account of the convenient shape and size in which they are made up. Funk & Wagnalls publish them.

The Magazines.

THE initial number of Scribner's Magazine is satisfactory in appearance and contents, and will be read throughout with unabated interest. It is pleasant to have Mr. Washburne's Reminiscences of the Siege and Commune of Paris. The wonder is that they have not been published before. Mr. Frederic's story, Seth's Brother's Wife, begins with promise. The Story of a New York House, by H. C. Bunner, whets one's curiosity. Capt. F. V. Greene writes as few men can on Our Defenceless Coasts, and Dr. W. H. Ward's careful discussion of Babylonian Seals will be welcomed by thousands. All these papers are pleasingly illustrated, and are but a portion of the contents of an agreeable impression.

In the Popular Science Monthly Mr. John Burroughs, under the title Science and Theology, traverses Prof. Drummond's book on "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," and has much to say in regard to the present relations of Science and Christianity. We are ready to contest nearly all the points he makes, but acknowledge the charm of his style and admire the concluding pages of his criticism. It is somewhat startling to find a lady taking ground against the Higher Education of Women; yet this is just what Mrs. E. Lynn Linton does with much vigor. Sir William Dawson's address on the Geology of the Atlantic Ocean, and Prof. Benedict's Outlines from the History of Education are concluded in the current number. Zoological Superstitions, Energy in Plant-Cells, Life in the South Sea Islands, How to Warm Our Houses, A Sketch of M. Arago, with the Editor's Table, the Miscellany and Notes, and half a dozen other articles, aid in making up a pamphlet which informs and stimulates the mind.

THE MIDNIGHT SUN; THE TSAR AND THE NIHILIST. By J. M. BUCKLEY, LL.D. Fully and finely illustrated. Extra cloth. $3.00. This work is the fruit of the painstaking investigation for which Dr. Buckley is noted. Its style is both animated and accurate. A Russian, who is a Nihilist and has seen the advance sheets, says: "It is the fairest and fullest account of Nihilism in the same space in the English language." And a loyalist Russian says that "it must have been written by a person long resident in Russia." The numerous fine illustrations, especially necessary in describing countries unlike all others, add equally to the interest and value of the book.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

Merry Christmas.

ONCE more the Christmas joy encircles the world. Again the Christmas tree, its boughs laden with the rich fruit of household love and gleaming with tapers, is the central adornment of many a household. Gifts are exchanged between members of the same families and amongst friends and kindred. For weeks the thought in our hearts has not been "what shall we receive, but what shall we give at the Christmas-time?" and the more it is in our power to give, the fuller we are of gratitude and happiness.

To some of us the Christmas anniversary is saddened because of the beloved ones we miss. As we grow older, to all days of festival comes a shadowed side, though the shadows are heaven-lighted and cheered if we have faith in the goodness and grace of God, who gathers all the severed threads and binds them into the bundle of life.

All grudges, all selfishness, all which is unworthy should be put away from us, often as we reflect on the precious love which came into the world for its redemption.

Let us think of our Saviour, of the Babe of Bethlehem, and at His feet, again, on Christmas morning lay our gifts, the gold, the frankincense, the myrrh.

The Christmas Tax.

"I HAVE seventy-five persons in my own immediate circle who must be remembered," said a lady, heaving a weary sigh as she returned from a round of Christmas shopping. "There are all John's relations, as well as my own, and the number of persons who expect something seems to multiply every year. Christmas is becoming a real tax on our purse. We have to skimp and save for weeks to make up for our extravagance at Christmas."

I do not like the word "expect" in this connection. It takes the charm from an expression of love, and what else than tangible expression is a gift from one hand to another, to have it weighed and measured, its value appraised, its cost reckoned at market rates. Nobody should be in an attitude of expectation at Christmas, except as the children are so in heir delighted anticipations of a happy time. The moment the gift-exchange takes on the form of the quid pro quo, it is cheapened and debased. "I seek not yours, but you," is love's creed in its fullest and richest estate. If we are sure of one another's esteem and affection we do not need gifts and tokens to deepen the love nor strengthen the bond, although every gift, however simple and uncostly, is precious for the giver's sake.

Christmas cards, which may be very expensive, may be found in great variety and at trifling cost, and they ought to relieve the embarrassment of the lady with the seventy-five people in the first circle, and the doubtless widening host of acquaintances in the second and third, beyond the doors of her own and her husband's kindred.

A Change of Heart.

BY ELA THOMAS.

Part II.

HESTER ANN was too unaccustomed to defeat to yield at the first contest. Again and again she renewed the attack, but in spite of it all the "ell" was built, and the house made ready for its new inmate. By this time Hester Ann's wrath had got the better of her judgment, and all Hopton knew that she didn't "favor the match." Indeed, she made no scruple of saying that "Lettie Goddard was a bigger pill than she could swallow," and making it distinctly understood that the people who continued friends of her brother's wife would no longer be counted as friends of hers. And so from the Rexrood homestead the agitation spread through Hopton, and the people were divided into a Hester Ann faction and a Lettie faction, for having been for several years the village schoolmistress, the latter was not without a large following of her own.

As for Lettie herself, motherless and sisterless, she had hoped for a welcome from Elias' family, but when she found that on the sister's part it was not forthcoming, as would most young women under similar circumstances, she resented it keenly and considered, as did her friends with her, that Elias had a right to marry whom he chose, and that in her interference Hester Ann was "meddling with what was none of her business."

In the early autumn they were married and Elias brought his bride home, where Hester Ann betrayed no consciousness of her presence by word or look. The house had been so arranged that any personal encounter was infrequent, and when it did occur Hester Ann was seemingly blind, except that she went her way with her lips more firmly shut and her chin, if possible, squarer than before.

At the same time her sharp eyes were on the newcomer with cold and critical watchfulness. She knew to a minute when her washings were out, and when her meals were ready, and few were the failures in her new undertaking of which, in some mysterious manner, Hester was not cognizant. Lettie had expected this and had begun her married life with a resolution that she would show Hester Ann that other people beside herself could work and keep things up, a determination that more than once spurred her ambition amid the varied trials and tribulations of her early housekeeping.

Old Mrs. Rexrood was as friendly as was possible, considering the influence of Hester Ann's dominating will, but at best she was little more than a cipher, and died before the close of the first year. That event, too, occurred without the protracted watching and anxiety that often knits sundered hearts. There were a few hours of unconsciousness only and all was over.

A few months later and another angel, this time of life, visited the old house, and the time-honored cradle was brought down from the garret for a baby boy. True to her threat, not once had Hester Ann spoken to her sister-in-law or crossed the threshold of her apartments. It was not in human nature for Elias not to resent this treatment of his wife, but, though friendly, social intercourse between the brother and sister was a thing of the past, the many interests they still held in common brought them not infrequently together. And Elias' delight in his boy overflowed even to Hester Ann, in the remark that he wished "mother could have lived, she would so have enjoyed the baby."

To which Hester Ann rejoined crisply, that for her part she "didn't see what enjoyment anybody could find in a squalling young one."

However, notwithstanding his aunt's disfavor, the baby grew and flourished, and when he was a little more than two years old was joined by a little sister.

"Well, Elias, I hope you can afford this sort of thing," was Hester Ann's salutation the first time she saw her brother after the baby's advent. "To be sure you'll have the whole farm when I'm through with it, but I'm well and tough, and likely to outlive you. And children are a big expense, what with doctors and hired girls, and the cost of their bringing up, and children now-a-days have to have things different from what we did. We never had embroidered cloaks and colored kid shoes."

Elias' cheek flushed. "If Lettie wants to make her children look pretty, and I don't object, I don't know as anybody else need to. And as to my family, I've never asked you to help support it, have I?"

"No, not yet."

"Well, when I do it will be time enough for you to worry," and he turned away.

Hester Ann knew that such speeches as hers only widened the breach between Elias and herself, but she could not resist the temptation to make them. Poor woman! in her self-elected solitude she had ample time to nurse her thwarted will and lay up a store of bitterness against Lettie as the cause of it all, unaware that she was, in reality, inflicting injury on herself instead of on the object of her hatred, whose life was so full of the commingled happiness and trials which makes up the existence of the wife and mother, that she had little time for the cherishing of resentments.

So, as time went by, as is inevitable with those who nourish the ignoble, Hester Ann grew narrow, hard and sour, and regarding all friendliness shown to Lettie as an indignity to herself, shut herself up more and more to brood over the fact that Lettie was taking the position that by right was hers, and walked out of church on communion Sunday, leaving Lettie amongst "the elect," as she termed them, with the feeling in her heart that God and man were equally unjust.

It was Christmas Day. Elias and his family had driven away to the church, two miles distant. Hester Ann had her own horse and buggy and hired man, but as she saw them go she thought, resentfully, "Time was that Elias would have asked me to go on Christmas."

To cherish a grudge makes anyone unhappy, and Hester's heart grew full of rebellion against God, and anger at the happiness which seemed the portion of everyone but herself.

The next impulse was to fill the day with more work than usual, but this was a trifle difficult, for the week's washing and ironing were done, the Christmas baking had come in the day before, the fall cleaning was of course over, and her house as clean as strength could make it. So, after she had washed her kitchen windows and put clean papers on all her pantry shelves, she bethought her of a contemplated rag-carpet, and, lighting a small hand-lamp, mounted to the garret, where in a dark closet under the eaves she kept the cast-off garments intended for carpet-rags.

After due deliberation she had selected her material and started to leave, when, by inadvertance, she stepped on a board of the loosely-laid floor that tipped with her.

With the instinct to save herself from falling, she dropped her bundle and caught at the nearest support, which chanced to be a pile of furniture which had been removed from the lower rooms at the time of Elias' marriage, and stacked in a great heterogeneous heap.

The force of her sudden grasp loosened the chair she had caught at, and with it the articles supported by it. There was a sudden crash. Hester Ann was thrown to the floor and the lamp knocked out of her hand. For a moment she lay stunned and almost senseless from a blow on her forehead; and then the sensation of warm blood trickling down her face aroused her. The lamp in its fall had not exploded, but broken, and the oil, fortunately but a small quantity, catching fire, was burning in a bright blaze at a little distance.

Hester Ann made a hasty motion to rise, and then a groan escaped her white lips; not because of the hurt on her head or the pain of her ankle, caught under the board floor and badly wrenched, but from the fact that she was immovably fastened down. For the chair, resting across her, while it supported the rest, pinioned her arms fast, burdened as it was with the heavy furniture, each piece of old-fashioned solidity and weight.

She was a strong woman, and her situation lent her the strength of desperation, but she was powerless to move or extricate herself. She was as a prisoner bound to the stake and the fire of execution kindled. Her hired man had gone for the day. Elias and his family had not yet returned. To cry for help was useless, for even were Lettie in the house, her rooms were distant.

The garret was part of Hester Ann's domain. Nobody would or could know her peril till the flames, bursting through roof or window, gave the alarm, and by that time where would she be?

She shuddered at the thought. She had vaguely expected to die sometime in the remote future, but to have death come upon her now, before she had reached middle age, and while she was in full health and strength; death, too, in one of its cruelest forms—it was awful, and she made another fruitless struggle for release.

To have the old Rexrood home go too, the home which she had saved so carefully. They might save things in the lower rooms. Oh, but they would not save her!

She had shut the garret-stair door to keep the cat from following. There was no wind to fan the flames. They were spreading slowly, but still spreading. She wondered if she would smother with the smoke before they reached her. To burn to death! Oh, and she was not ready to die yet; she could not die! In that supreme moment, her life so soon to end rose before her. How pitiful and worthless it appeared—hard and narrow and unlovely. She had neither made her peace with God nor man; not an hour before her heart had been full of bitterness toward both. True, Elias had thwarted her, but how unforgiving she had been. "As we forgive those that trespass against us," rang in her ears like a voice of doom. She had prided herself on her justice and honesty; what a mockery! She had wronged Lettie and defrauded God, and the worst of all was that in her secret consciousness she had known it all the time. And now there was no space for repentance. She could feel the hot breath of that cruel flame, and her prayer was only a moan, "My God, O my God!"

There was a sound; the door at the foot of the stairs opening, quick steps ran up and Lettie's face appeared at the top. Hester Ann's heart beat with a great throb of gladness. God had been merciful, help had come. "Where's Elias?" she gasped, for the smoke was growing thick.

"He has gone on to take Mrs. Green home,"

Hester Ann groaned. She had fallen just beyond the great chimney which filled the centre of the garret, on one side of which to the eaves was the stacked furniture, while on the other side the line of fire had crept like a fiery hedge.

"No, no, Lettie!" she exclaimed, as the latter gathered her dress about her and took a step forward. "I've never done anything for you that you need risk and maybe lose your life for me. You have Elias and the children to think of. Leave me, and try to get help to save the house."

But before she had finished the words Lettie had disappeared down the stairs.

"She might at least have said she was sorry for me," murmured Hester Ann, following her with desparing eyes.

But hardly a moment had elapsed till Lettie was back again, with a pail of water and a heavy blanket she had caught from the lower rooms.

She was none too soon. The flame was within an inch of Hester Ann's dress. Quickly dipping her blanket in the water, Lettie beat a path, through which she sprang.

Amid all the terror of her position, Hester Ann's mind had lost none of its clearness. "Give that old sofa of Grandmother Rexrood's a push," she directed. "There, now if you can lift the corner of that bedstead, so," and, adding her own strength to Lettie's, she succeeded in freeing herself.

There was no time to lose. The fire, checked for a moment, was gaining fresh headway; the smoke was blinding and stifling. Hester Ann found herself unable to bear her weight on her injured ankle. "Lean on me," gasped Lettie, as she threw the remaining water before her, and half-supporting, half-dragging her sister-in-law, staggered across the hot, charred boards through the suffocating smoke, with the flames leaping toward them on either side. On the garret stairs they both sank down, weak from excitement, smoke-grimed, spent and breathless.

Hester Ann was the first to speak. "Lettie Goddard," she panted, "I hope you'll forgive me for all I've felt and said. You've risked your own life to save mine, when I didn't deserve it, and I never shall forget it of you, never. And now if you'll bring some water up here, I'll manage to get it up the stairs while you run for help, and we will save the old house, too."

An hour later Hester Ann lay on the lounge in Lettie's room, with a black plaster across her forehead, a bandage of wormwood and vinegar around her ankle, rocking with one hand the cradle of the year-old baby.

"Yes, Elias," she was saying, "it was a clear case of Providence that Lettie came home just as she did, and going upstairs to change her dress felt the heat overhead, and knew at once the garret must be on fire, and that you came home as you did, too. And though everybody has something to be thankful for to-day if they only know it, very few have the cause that I have. For the Lord has granted to me what He seldom does—to see my own life in the light of the next, and then given me time for repentance and improvement, and I tell you, Elias Rexrood, I am going to use it." So they had a Merry Christmas after all.

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

Keeping Christmas.

"I SAY, Jack!"

"Halloa!"

"There's a regular old-fashioned snowstorm. Whew! how it comes down! and don't it drift, though!"

"Well, that's all the merrier for Christmas. We'll have a chance, perhaps, to get the sleigh out before night. Santa Claus likes such weather as this. Let's hurry up and find out what he has left for us."

This proposal met with the favor of Jack's younger brother Walter. A few moments later found them in the spacious kitchen of the farm house searching for their Christmas gifts. But, wonderful to relate, these were not to be found.

"Wonder if the old fellow's forgotten us, after all," exclaimed Jack. "Maybe he thinks we haven't been good enough to get any presents. I've been trying to behave, though, lately; haven't you, Wallie?"

"Why, yes. Didn't I do all the churning for ma yesterday; And didn't I go to the post-office late last evening to save pa a walk? I think Santa Claus might have given me a cake, at least."

"Well, since he seems to have neglected it, let's make the best of things, and get the fire made and the kettle boiling before ma makes her appearance."

The two boys, active, sturdy fellows, moved about, not awkwardly, but skilfully, making preparations for breakfast, so that the affairs were in a forward state of progress when their mother opened the door of her sleeping-room.

She was received with open arms and many kisses by her sons, who were neither too big nor too proud to show their love for their mother.

"Merry Christmas, ma! merry Christmas! Isn't pa ever going to get up? And what's become of Santa Claus? He passed us by last night. We thought we wouldn't hang up our stockings, but we were not expecting that he would forget us entirely."

"Santa Claus has promised to come to breakfast," answered Mrs. Beale, quite gravely. "I think he will enjoy these chops that you have been cooking."

"Now that's a new caper, I must say. Who ever supposed that he would take time to eat on Christmas morning? Yet we'll welcome his reverence, all the same. I think I'll ring the bell. Perhaps it will bring him along."

Sure enough. The good saint, in his holiday robe of fur, answered the summons. In his arms he carried rather an unusual burden—a beautiful child. This was none other than the boys' sister Mabel—the four-year-old household pet. It was she, rather than her kindly bearer, who distributed the gifts. I shall not tell you what they were. You may imagine what sort of presents three healthy country children would be likely to want, and it is safe to say that these favored ones had very nearly all that they wanted. Somehow old Nicholas had found his way about the boys' own room and put himself into possession of the articles which they had intended giving to the rest of the family. They had a good deal of sport over these, especially when, twice, at least, Santa Claus put something into his own pocket, declaring that it was just what he wanted for himself.

I cannot say that the children were surprised when at length he laid aside his robes and, appearing then as plain Mr. Beale, sat down to the table with the others. He praised the boys' cooking and showed his appreciation of the chops, as Mrs. Beale had predicted.

"Now, boys," said he after awhile, "we have had our fun and jokes. Soon we will have prayers, as usual, and then I think that, as the storm seems to be over, it would be well for you to clear the paths."

Walter and Jack agreed to this very readily. They thought it only a pleasant pastime to shovel away so much of the snow as was likely to prove a hindrance to their movements. Indeed, they enjoyed the exercise so well, that after doing what was to be done at home, Jack proposed giving a benefit to one of their neighbors.

"Suppose we go over and shovel out old Mrs. Ten Broeck. I saw her hired man yesterday, and he said he was going off on a visit. I know she'll be glad to have us come."

"Of course she will. And it will only be a little more play for us. Come along."

"Dearie me! dearie me! What good boys you are, to be sure. It ought to be merry Christmas for you all the days of the year. Here I've been studying and planning, wondering how I was ever going to make my way to the barn to see about the cow and the chickens, and now the first thing I know you come along and offer to clear the paths for me. Well, it only shows how wrong it is to worry, and how Providence takes care of us in little things as well as in big ones. After you get through just come into the house, and I'll have a nice lunch for you."

Such a hearty response to their offer made the boys quite happy over their work. It was something of a task, although they accounted it play, and their backs were aching a trifle when at last they entered their neighbor's roomy kitchen, announcing that now there was nothing to hinder her from walking about as she pleased.

Mrs. Ten Broeck offered them crullers and milk, for which their boyish appetites were quite ready. Producing a single, handsome card, the old lady said, smiling the while, "I sent into town the other day for Christmas cards to give to my friends. But Nelson, my man, made a mistake and brought only this for a sample. I shall have to make it do for you both. Perhaps if you will read the verse that is on it and take it as a message to yourselves, it will be worth more to you than a more costly gift."

The boys did read the verse: "My son, give me thine heart." They talked it over on the way home.

"Queer!" said Walter; "those very words came into my mind when we were getting breakfast this morning. It seemed almost as though I heard some one saying them to me, and I do believe I did, I tell you what, Jack, I mean to obey. I mean to give my heart on this Christmas morning to the Lord Jesus Christ. I think He will accept it, if I am only a romping boy."

Nothing more was said just then, but at night when they were going to bed Jack made this remark:

"Seems to me, Walter, you've had just as good a time to-day as though you hadn't made up your mind to be a Christian. I expected you'd want to stay at home and pray instead of taking a sleigh-ride this afternoon, and I thought it was a chance if you'd ever go coasting again, but you're a boy, after all, aren't you, old fellow?"

"Yes, indeed, I am, and a great deal happier one because I made that decision this morning. I tell you, Jack, it's been the best day of my life. I only wish that you and all the boys I know could understand how very glad it makes a person to feel that he belongs to Christ." COUSIN LOIS.

Dr. Talmage on Christmas.

CHRISTMAS bells ring in family reunion! The rail-trains crowded with children coming home. The poultry fed, as never since they were born, stand wondering at the farmer's generosity. The markets are full of massacred barn-yards. The great table will be spread and crowded with two or three or four generations. Plant the fork astride the breast-bone, and with skilful twitch, that we could never learn, give to all the hungry lookers-on a specimen of holiday anatomy. Florence is disposed to soar, give her the wing. The boy is fond of music, give him the drumstick. The minister is dining with you, give him the parson's nose. May the joy reach from grandfather, who is so terribly old that he can hardly find the way to his plate, down to the baby in the high chair, who with one smart pull of the table-cloth upsets the gravy into the cranberry. Send from your table a liberal portion to the poor, some of the white meat as well as the dark, not confining your generosity to gizzards and scraps. Do not, as in some families, keep a plate and chair for those who are dead and gone. Your holiday feast would be but poor fare for them; they are at a better banquet in the skies. Let the whole land be full of chime and carol. Let bells, silver and brazen, take their sweetest voice, and the towers of Christendom rain music.—Brooklyn Magazine.

Bishop Hannington.

BY THE REV. EDWARD J. RUNK, A.M.

BRAVE bishop of Christ's holy Word and flock,
That heardst the voice from Galilee divine,
That men should go, and cause world-wide to shine
His blessed Gospel, where the imaged stock
Of heathen darkness, wooded stream, or rock
Receives from millions, whom gross sins confine,
The adoration due to Him, whose shrine
Is spirits pure, not toys that reason mock!
Forward thy footsteps trod the Afric shore,
And pierced those gloomy, wretched wilds of sin,
To preach the tidings of the healing Cross,
Till rage of unbelief thy body tore,
And freed thy soul the martyr's crown to win,
Upborne on psalmists' wings—to thee no loss.*

NOVEMBER 6th, 1886.

The Uganda Persecution.

MR. STANLEY recommended that missionaries should be sent to King Mtsesa and his people. With others the Church Missionary Society of Great Britain sent men and women to Uganda. Their preaching and teaching were blessed of God, and a number of natives, among them members of the royal family, were received into the Christian Church. Mtsesa died and was succeeded by King Mwanga, whose mind had been poisoned by slave traders and other wicked men whose business the mission indirectly interfered with and who found the presence of honorable and intelligent Europeans irksome, for they would report to the world the wickedness they witnessed. After savage growls and threats and imprisonments Mwanga began a persecution last year which, in its extent and severity, is almost unprecedented in the history of modern missions. Of the demeanor of the Christians the following accounts are given in The Record, published by the Society:

"Nua, the chief of all the blacksmiths in the land, was one of our most prominent people. On hearing that arrests were being made he hurried off his wife and children, as well as some two or three Christian lads who were living with him. There he sat awaiting arrest. Nor had he long to wait; the executioners arrived and led him off unresistingly. For a week he was kept with the other prisoners, and we hear that he appealed to the executioners to embrace Christianity. Seeing, among those in the stocks with him, a chief who had been condemned for shooting and wounding a man and stealing cattle, Nua implored the executioner not to execute the cattle-stealer along with those who were dying for their faith. This was reported to the king, who sent and pardoned the cattle-stealer, but left Nua to be burnt alive with the others. After the massacre, the head-executioner reported to the king that he had never killed men who showed such fortitude and endurance, and that they had prayed aloud to God in the fire. This caused merriment in the court, the king remarking, that 'God did not rescue them from his power.'

"Mr. Ashe sends brief notes of some of those who have been killed in Uganda for the testimony of Jesus, from which we extract the following:

"'First is Munyaga Roberto. Baptized June 22d, 1884. One of the king's door-keepers and messengers, a communicant and married; member of Native Church Council. Burned alive, June 5th, 1886. The story is that first a hand was hacked off and roasted before his eyes, then a leg. We are not quite certain of the exact date of his martyrdom; we were kept many days in suspense, and when the terrible tale was confirmed, we could not be sure of the day. A touching incident in connection with him I mentioned—it was he who recovered the bishop's Bible, buying it from one of the murderers. When we were giving him the price, he wished to pay part himself, for he wanted to show that he was grateful for the bishop's self-sacrifice on behalf of such as he.

"'Second, Malukaga Nua. Baptized September 21st, 1884. A very earnest Christian, regular attendant and communicant, active in teaching, and most generous in receiving the brethren at his house. At the time of the bishop's murder, he sheltered as many as eight of the mission children and women; elected member of Native Church Council, of which he was an active member. Was burnt alive, confessing his faith and exhorting his executioners to believe.'"

Bishop Hannington, sent by the society from England, a man greatly beloved, was put to death after privations which may properly be called tortures. His diary was saved and has been published, and from it these extracts are taken:

Wednesday, Oct. 21.—After describing the cruel usage he suffered at the hands of those who arrested him, he wrote: "In spite of all, feeling I was being dragged away to be murdered at a distance, I sang 'Safe in the Arms of Jesus,' and 'My God, I am Thine,' and then laughed at the very agony of my situation."

Thursday, Oct. 22...."Fearfully shaken, scarce power to hold up small Bible. Shall I live through it? My God, I am Thine....I fear I am in a caged-lion frame of mind, and yet, so strained and shattered, it is with the utmost difficulty that I can stand; and yet, though in close confinement, there are many mercies to be thankful for. I ought to be praising His Holy Name, and I do."

Friday, Oct. 23...."I came out [of his tent] and there was the chief and about 100 of his wives come to feast their eyes on me in cruel curiosity. I felt inclined to spring at his throat, but sat still, and presently read to myself Matthew 10: 44, 45, and felt refreshed."

Wednesday, Oct. 28...."A terrible night....I don't think I got one sound hour's sleep, and woke with fever fast developing. O Lord, do have mercy upon me and release me. I am quite broken down, and brought low. Comforted by reading Psalm 27." Later, on the same day, he adds: "Much comforted by Psalm 28."

Thursday, Oct. 29.—The eighth day of his imprisonment, and the day on which it is believed he was killed. He wrote: "I can hear no news, but was held up by Psalm 30, which came with great power."

Reflex Influence of Foreign Missions.

BUT is the missionary zeal which has been so remarkably rekindled in the present age likely to burn on without exhaustion, and continue to inspire the sacrifices in the absence of which evangelization on an adequate scale for the world's conversion would be impracticable? An affirmative answer is suggested by several considerations. We would point, in the first place, to the great change which has passed over the world's estimate of the missionary vocation since the early part of the century, when such choice phrases as "consecrated cobblers," "tub preachers," "maimed and crippled gladiators," "apostates from the loom and anvil," were freely flung at the heads of the adventurous few who dared to open the Lord's controversy with the natives of India. A cause which filled the hearts and inspired the prayers of such prelates as Heber, Cotton and Milman can no longer be treated with disdain. The last eighty years have enriched the Christian inheritance by the memory of many heroic pioneers of the Gospel, whose achievements "smell sweet and blossom in their dust," and extort even the world's admiration, while they serve as a model and a spur to younger generations of the faithful. As best known to ourselves, we may mention among the evangelists of the East, Carey, Judson and Martyn in the spring-time of the revival, followed by Wilson, Duff and Morrison; in the islands of the Pacific, Williams, Ellis, Selwyn and Patteson; in the wilds of Africa, Moffat and Livingstone, Mackenzie and Steere, and, latest of all, the intrepid Hannington, whose blood, poured out last autumn at Unyalla, will doubtless fertilize the soil for Christ. Of such spiritual heroes it is the prerogative to bequeath their mantle to the churches; and already the result may be discerned, both in the nobler estimate of missionary enterprise which now prevails, and in the self-dedication to the work, often at great personal sacrifice, of many of the church's most promising youth. Cambridge has now its own corporate mission in the seat of the old Mogul empire at Delhi; Oxford in the modern capital of Calcutta; the two Universities combine to sustain a powerful mission for Eastern Africa at Zanzibar; Dublin has just caught the sacred fire; from the three hundred colleges of the United States one hundred and eighty-seven candidates are reported as offering themselves for the missionary fields; China is being traversed by a band of pioneers, recruited from among Cambridge athletes and Edinburgh students; to Japan, stretching out her arms to us, Cambridge again is giving of her best. Here is a better augury than even the steady growth of funds already mentioned. And it ought to be remembered how closely, according to universal experience, the two things are connected the vital energy and the material supplies. If the awakening of the churches to a sense of responsibility for the heathen has produced the missions, the missions have reacted upon the churches, and helped to stir up a tenfold activity in evangelizing the masses at home. Of this the story of the Church of England presents an illustration which is almost startling. Her contribution to foreign missions during the last twenty-five years is estimated at somewhat more than ten million sterling. But, so far from this large export of her resources having crippled her domestic work, during the same quarter of a century she has voluntarily spent at least seventy millions more in strengthening her position and making effectual her labors among her children at home. Surely her gifts to the heathen have returned into her own bosom! And now that our colleges and public schools have come eagerly forward to plant missions in our crowded cities, where the old parochial organization was overpowered by the unconverted masses of the population, we may be sure that the claims of the heathen will not long be overlooked by them. Already we hear of at least two of our great schools beginning to send succor to the work in India. Let it be recognized, too, that recent events exhibit the presence of a spirit in the churches which difficulties and dangers cannot daunt. When the news of Bishop Hannington's murder reached England a few months ago, the immediate response to it was the offer of a score of men, some of considerable standing, to go out and reinforce the mission in the service of which he fell, or any others where help was needed.—Quarterly Review.

The Salvation Army's Origin.

I PROMISED last week to give a sketch, as brief as may be, of the origin of this remarkable body, which has survived every concrete argument for its destruction, and increased to marvellous proportions. It is in a sense the work of one man, and that man recently among us. General William Booth was born at Nottingham, England, and experienced conversion in attendance on meetings of the Wesleyan Methodists at the age of thirteen. His character received deep religious impressions under the preaching of the distinguished American revivalist, Rev. James Caughey, who at the time was drawing vast throngs in the various cities of England. The special traits of the latter in his dealing with the unconverted were specially remembered as giving character to his own methods afterwards. Two things greatly impressed him: the use of practical common sense in applying the Gospel, and its effects on the poorest and most desolate people. Meetings were started by him and a few of his young associates in a cottage; they were held every night. They had lively songs and brief exhortations and prayers. At seventeen he was urged by the Superintendent Minister to apply for an appointment as "local preacher." He declined, believing, as he says, "that I could get more souls saved on the rough and ready lines I was then following out than on any other that I could hope at that time to reach." Being pressed, a couple of years later, to study for the ministry, he consented, went to London, but spent much time in meetings for exhortation among the common people, seeing many saved. Here he became interested in the condition of East London. He preached at a little chapel there with great power and immediate results. In other places also, his meetings were attended by such power that he began to acquire quite a local reputation. At Guernsy, several hundred persons were awakened. At Staffordshire and other neighboring places, where he labored for seven weeks, 1,700 persons professed conversion. These manifestations led to his being set apart by the Committee of the Methodist New Connexion to the work of an evangelist for their entire denomination.

Next year he was married to the wife who has been such a remarkable co-worker with him, and of whom he says: "If I have stood in the relation of a father to the Salvation Army movement, surely my precious wife may be considered as its mother."

In a tour which he subsequently took through York, Leeds, Halifax, Hull, Sheffield, and other places, the same remarkable results followed, between three and four thousand persons professing to find salvation. Shortly after, the authorities of the Connexion, for various reasons of the Church order, determined that he should return to the regular pastorate. He thereupon resigned his position in that body, and went out alone with his wife and child, to serve God according to his own convictions. He was invited to labor in Cornwall. His aim was to get down to the masses of the poor and neglected, and thousands were reached with the Gospel to their salvation. Here and at Walsall the difficulty of getting the lower orders to come to the meetings in the chapel, led to extraordinary methods of work, with a view to compel them to come in. The fight was a desperate one. "Night after night," he says, "I spoke to large crowds in the Market square, processioning through the darkest and blackest slums to the chapel, into which very few would enter; so far as the door they came but no farther."

Then came the remarkable movement, afterwards called "The Hallelujah Band." These were men who had been notorious, but who had been converted; poachers, prize-fighters, jail-birds, and others of the same class. These celebrities were advertised, not as the respectable and religious people they were then, but by the characters they had before their conversion. They had a morning march, wagons in the fields, and meetings all day; with great crowds of people coming from curiosity, but many of them brought to Christ by the narratives of conversion of the remarkable characters, and by the fact that somebody cared for the low-down masses.—Evangelica, in the Baptist Weekly.

* In Bishop Hannington's diary the last entries testify the consoling power of the inspired psalms.

Financial.

TUESDAY, DEC. 21.

THE visible supply of grain in the United States and Canada, east of the Rocky Mountains, was reported yesterday as being: 61,459,874 bushels of wheat, 12,164,603 of corn, and 5,098,-639 of oats; being an increase for the week of 1,470,344 bushels of wheat, 547,776 of corn, and a decrease of 24,-324 bushels of oats. As compared with Dec. 19th, 1885, the supply of wheat shows an increase of 1,600,000 bushels. The accuracy of the report is disputed. Exporters bought freely during the week. The market, with fractional fluctuations, continued strong. The reports of yesterday afternoon were that English markets were quiet, Dutch and French somewhat lower. Quotations for January grain were: Wheat here 89 1-8, in Chicago 76 5-8; corn here 47 1-2, in Chicago 36 3-8; oats here 34 1-8, in Chicago 25 7-8. There is an expectation that during the holidays prices may decline a little. The provision market is firm. A report is current that hogs are becoming scarce. The closing quotations for cotton yesterday were: Dec. 9.34–35, Jan. 9.37, Feb. 9.47–48, March 9.58–59. Hay and straw are not in as full supply. Prices are: Choice timothy, 85 to 90 cents; clover mixed, 65 to 70; long rye straw, 65 to 70; oat, 45 to 55; wheat, 45.

The Stock Market exhibited its strength on Wednesday last under a severe scare, which became nearly a panic. Over 1,100,000 shares were thrown on the market, making the sales the largest of any one day in the history of the exchange. There were reasons for a decline in the speculative securities and in some Southern railroad stocks and bonds, whose value is chiefly in the future; but the fright was mainly the result of manipulation, was largely artificial. It is said and denied that money was made scarce by borrowers, who locked it up with the purpose of breaking the market. The supply of money is not abundant. The circulation of the National Banks has been reduced by the redemption of bonds, trade has increased and with it the demand for money. A squeeze is within the power of those able to borrow and hoard. The decline in values on Wednesday was from 3 to 15 per cent. It has been recovered in good part since. Yesterday the market drooped, influenced by selling on foreign account.

According to the last bank report, loans had been reduced during the week $3,719,800, specie had declined $1,646,800, legal tenders $28,600, deposits $6,412,400, and the surplus of legal reserve had decreased $72,300, making it $4,008,200. Sunday's steamer brought $600,000 gold from France, and yesterday's $359,000 more. Money during the week has been loaned at the rate of over 10 per cent. Nearly all the banks, however, have continued to accommodate their customers at 6 per cent on call.

The imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $6,972,-974, and the exports at $6,723,388. Foreign exchange sold yesterday at $4.80 for 60-day bills and $4.84 for demand for sterling.

ADDINGTON. In the full assurance of hope, at her residence, Fishkill-on-the-Hudson, Dec. 17, Eliza Van Voorhis, widow of the late William R. Addington, in the 84th year of her age.

The memory of the just is blessed.

HAWLEY.—On Thursday, Dec. 2, at her residence, 238 West Twenty-second street, Martha C., widow of Samuel W. Hawley, in the eighty-second year of her age.

SCHENCK.—Suddenly, on Nov. 22, at her residence in East New York, N. Y., Catharine (Meserole) Schenck, widow of the late Isaac C. Schenck.

Mrs. Schenck follows her husband to the heavenly reward within less than two years after the latter's departure. They had lived together in happy union for nearly forty-nine years, at the time of his death. Just a year ago Mrs. Schenck moved into a new and beautiful home, with the two children who still formed a part of her household. She was a lady of large means, and her name is fondly remembered by the many who enjoyed her generous and multiplied benefactions. The East New York Reformed Church, also, has cause to remember with gratitude her generous gifts to various objects. Among other things, the entire set of beautiful pulpit furniture, desk, chairs, and table, remain a constant reminder of her presence among us. Her Christian character was noteworthy for a sweet and unassuming gentleness. Though past three score and ten, she was rarely absent from her place. Within a few weeks of her death she had occasional attacks of great painfulness, which she bore with Christian fortitude and uncomplaining submissiveness. When the sudden attack came upon her which brought death, she sank down upon the floor, exclaiming, "O, I am so happy." And with these as the last words upon her lips, she went, indeed, to realize a happiness which was greater thad earth could give, and which will never be taken away. "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever." D. V. P.

A Common Cold

Is often the beginning of serious affections of the Throat, Bronchial Tubes, and Lungs. Therefore, the importance of early and effective treatment cannot be overestimated. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral may always be relied upon for the speedy cure of a Cold or Cough.

Last January I was attacked with a severe Cold, which, by neglect and frequent exposures, became worse, finally settling on my lungs. A terrible cough soon followed, accompanied by pains in the chest, from which I suffered intensely. After trying various remedies, without obtaining relief, I commenced taking Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and was Speedily Cured.

I am satisfied that this remedy saved my life.—Jno. Webster, Pawtucket, R. I.

I contracted a severe cold, which suddenly developed into Pneumonia, presenting dangerous and obstinate symptoms. My physician at once ordered the use of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. His instructions were followed, and the result was a rapid and permanent cure.—H. E. Simpson, Rogers Prairie, Texas.

Two years ago I suffered from a severe Cold which settled on my Lungs. I consulted various physicians, and took the medicines they prescribed, but received only temporary relief. A friend induced me to try Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. After taking two bottles of this medicine I was cured. Since then I have given the Pectoral to my children, and consider it for Colds, Coughs, and all Throat and Lung diseases, ever used in my family.—Robert Vanderpool, Meadville, Pa.

Some time ago I took a slight Cold, which, being neglected, grew worse, and settled on my lungs. I had a hacking cough, and was very weak. Those who knew me best considered my life to be in great danger. I continued to suffer until I commenced using Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. Less than one bottle of this valuable medicine cured me, and I feel that I owe the preservation of my life to its curative powers.—Mrs. Ann Lockwood, Akron, New York.

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is considered, here, the one great remedy for all diseases of the throat and lungs, and is more in demand than any other medicine of its class.—J. F. Roberts, Magnolia, Ark.

The Prophecy of Unitarianism Concerning Calvinism.

UNITARIANISM has, in a figure, been standing around for the last half century, waiting and watching for Calvinism to burn up, or break up, or go up in some way or other and disappear from sight forever as an admissible form of religious belief. In caustic verses, in elaborate lectures and addresses, in fine sermons beautiful in literary quality and full of prophecy, it has been proclaiming, ever since the days of Channing, that Orthodoxy was certainly losing its power—that Calvinism was a dying, if not a dead faith. Whenever the apostles of Unitarianism have run out of other material, they have always had this to say, and their audiences have always cheered them to the echo in their confident prognostications.

But somehow or other, Calvinism does not consume or disappear. It is Unitarianism rather which is burning down, breaking down, running down and out, the continent over. The denominational statistics report neither marked advance of Unitarian sentiment, nor propagative power in the organization. If Unitarianism had not broadened out its airy tents so as to welcome beneath them the universalist, the restorationist, the pantheist, the materialist, and a dozen other religious notionists, the figures would undoubtedly reveal a marked decline in every quarter, unless it be in Eastern Massachusetts. And even there it seems to need the help of all the poets and litterateurs of the Commonwealth to keep it in countenance.

Calvinism does not consume or disappear. There may be occasional disaffection or revolt; every really strong theological system is liable to this, and often the revolt or disaffection proves nothing more clearly than the strength of the system. There have also been changes in the modes of stating and explaining the Calvinistic theology; it may be admitted that much that was characteristic of that theology in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries has since been subject to improvements, such as have been suggested to Calvinists themselves by the progress of thought and of research into the verities of the Scripture. But no one who apprehends at all the deeper movements of religious thought in our age, can justly say that Calvinism is dying out, or even diminishing. Is Presbyterianism, for example, dying out on our own continent, to say nothing of Europe? Does our own Church, which is a conspicuous and staunch representative of the Calvinistic system, show signs of decline, or even of standing still? Let Unitarianism show any indications of progress that will compare with our denominational record of one hundred and fifty new churches organized since the Reunion, making an aggregate twice or three times as great as the whole number of the Unitarian churches, the land over. Let Unitarianism present any record of development in all that makes a Christian denomination strong, efficient, fruitful, that will compare favorably with the report, for illustration, embodied in the Minutes of our last Assembly. Measured by the practical test of fruitage and result, there is in fact no room for comparison; it is Unitarianism rather, that is consuming and wasting away.

And the reason is not difficult to see. Calvinism has strong views, distinct beliefs, a compact and logical system of doctrine; Unitarianism has no such system. Calvinism has no doubts about the existence and character of God, and His relations to the universe; Unitarianism, when not debating dubiously whether there be any personal God, is seriously perplexed and confused over the problem of His place in the universe, His moral relations to man, His sovereignty over human life and destiny. Calvinism has clear faith in inspiration, and a hearty trust in the Scriptures as the Word of God; Unitarianism hardly knows whether it has a Bible, or what its Bible is and teaches. Calvinism has distinct views of man as a rational and moral being, of conscience and duty as spiritual and supreme elements in human life, of sin and guilt, of responsibility and of righteous condemnation; Unitarianism, in the person of John Fiske, is resolving conscience into an altruistic instinct common to man and beast, throwing aside the Bible view of sin and accountability, mystifying the doctrine of salvation, until one who listens can hardly discern whether any solid foundation for religion is left us. Calvinism has not only a clear doctrine of salvation, but also a divine Redeemer, a Gospel of grace, a living and divine Church, and a religion that is positive at every point, logically knit together, and firm as the granite; Unitarianism has no divine Saviour or divine redemption, and in reality no Gospel of grace to proclaim, no Church, and no definite creed or belief.—The Evangelist.

A GREAT religious movement seems to have begun in the neighborhood of Cuddapale, South India. In a single village five of the leading men have professed faith in Christ, and under their wide influence inquirers have become numerous.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

Books for the Home and Sabbath-School.

....The American Tract Society has issued two new and interesting books on missionary themes: "SCENES IN SOUTHERN INDIA," by Mrs. Murray Mitchell, and "ALONG RIVER AND ROAD IN FUH-KIEN," by Edwin Joshua Dukes. They are both abundantly illustrated, and not only give much valuable information regarding missionary life and work, but abound in incident and description of the regions specified, the appearance, manners, customs and modes of life of the people.

The latter volume is specially interesting for the free and often racy style in which it is written. It has also special value for members of the Reformed Church, in that it is written by one of the missionaries of the London Missionary Society at Amoy, and treats of the people and work in the province in which our Amoy Mission is located. It has, for a frontispiece, a picture of Amoy from the island of Kolongsu.

...."GRAHAM'S LADDIE." By Julia McNair Wright. One of the best kind of Scotch stories is here given, with the Scotch dialect spicing its pages. The description of the lad walking from the northwest coast to Glasgow and the adventures by the way, are told with a spirit which would have delighted Sir Walter himself. For home and Sunday-school we commend the book heartily. (Presbyterian Board of Publication.)

...."THE PELOUBET SERIES." This well-known series has made its appearance for the coming year. It includes a volume of Select Notes on the International Lessons and graded lesson books, suiting the instruction to minds of all ages. (W. A. Wilde & Co.)

...."LESSON COMMENTARY." Vincent and Hurlburt. This Commentary, with the Berean series of question books, prepared under the Rev. J. H. Vincent's supervision, offers another valuable set of helps for Sabbath-school teachers and scholars. (Phillips & Hunt.)

BY REV. JOHN C. VAN DEVENTER.

January 2d.—"The Beginning."—Gen. 1: 26–2: 3.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth."—GEN. 1: 1.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"Let us kneel before the Lord our maker."—Ps. 95: 6.

Introduction.

WE are about entering upon another course of lessons representing the entire Bible. Let us begin this work determined to seek in each lesson for something of personal application to ourselves, and something that tells of Christ.

The name Genesis means beginning or origin, and this book is a book of beginnings. It is the earliest record of man's life on earth, and even goes behind man's history and tells us of the work of preparing the earth for his home. It is, however, only a book of beginnings, for it covers so long a time that each line of thought is hinted at, rather than fully set forth; but in this opening book of the Bible we can find the germs of almost all that follows.

The selection before us at this time takes up the story of creation at the point where God crowned His work by making man and placing him on earth as His representative. No scientific writer has been able to approach this inspired chapter in giving a popular and correct view of the origin of the world in such a small compass. The established results of science only serve to illustrate the wonders of this record.

The Lesson.

I. THE CREATION OF MAN.—VS. 26, 27.

V. 26.—"And God said." This has been taken as representing a consultation between the Divine persons in reference to the creation of man, but the same expression occurs in other places in connection with the other steps in the making of the world, and properly represents the creative word, by which God brought creatures into existence. "In our image, after our likeness." The use of the plural here may be either as the plural of majesty, or a dim foregleam of the fact of the Trinity, to be revealed further on in the Scriptures. There is a distinction to be kept in mind between the word image and likeness. Image refers to the general plan or order of being to which man belongs, while likeness refers more to particular resemblance to the type of that plan. Man in his sinfulness retains the image of God as a spiritual being, but the image has been so marred by sin that the likeness has been destroyed. "And let them have dominion." Man was thus evidently intended to be creation's head and crown; a representative of the Creator.

V. 27.—We have in this verse the statement as fact, of that which has already been considered as purpose in the mind of God. With the Almighty thinking, speaking, and acting are as one thing.

II. THE DOMINION OF MAN.—VS. 28–31.

V. 28.—"And God blessed them." Man entered upon his career with every necessary endowment from his Creator, and with the Divine benediction pledging all further necessary help. "Replenish the earth and subdue it." The earth was to be man's possession and workshop. It is a mistake to suppose that the normal condition of human life is that of careless ease and idleness. God gave man capacity for a god-like activity, and gave him the earth, with its hid treasures, as a field for the exercise of his powers. Weariness, but not work, is the result of sin. "And have dominion." So long as man did not question God's claim to dominion over himself, his authority over all lower orders of creation would be unquestioned. The naming of the animals was the first manifest exercise of this dominion. With the rebellion of man against God came the rebellion of nature from man, so that the work of subduing the earth has become difficult, hazardous, and often disappointing, but in proportion as men have been reclaimed to the likeness of God, have the benefits of Christian civilization added to man's dominion over nature.

V. 29.—"I have given you every herb....unto you it shall be for meat." With the gift of life and the conferring of dominion came the needed provision. It is evident that men and animals were not intended to be eaters of flesh in their normal condition; but the entrance of sin so disturbed the economy of nature that the use of meat has become, to some extent, necessary for most men and most classes of animals.

V. 30.—In this verse the provision for the wants of the beasts is set forth, so that we see that the creation was perfect in the adaptation of its different parts to each other.

V. 31.—"And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good." With the creation of man the work of creation was completed, and we may think of God looking over His work, and taking the delight in its perfection that a skilled workman takes in the result of his thoughts and labors when they come up to his ideal and promise to realize his expectations. "And the evening and the morning were the sixth day." The days of creation have occasioned a great deal of study and controversy, but one point has been settled to the satisfaction of candid students, viz., that there is nothing in this inspired narrative that is contradicted by any facts or established laws of nature as ascertained by scientific investigation. Moses knew more than the best scholars because he was taught directly by God Himself.

III. THE CREATOR'S SABBATH.—VS. 1-3.

V. 1.—"Thus the heavens and the earth were finished." Science teaches that the work of building up the world and furnishing it with inhabitants ceased thousands of years ago. Since the creation of man there have been no new geological formations; simply modifications of those already existing; and no new orders of animal life, simply improvement, especially under human cultivation. When God ceased from the work of creation, it was because that work was finished.

V. 2.—"He rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made." This rest was not caused by weariness, nor did it consist in idleness; but, from that which pertained to the physical and temporal, God passed to the spiritual work of governing and redeeming, so that this seventh day has never run its course; its evening shadows were when sin settled down upon the earth like a death pall; its first rays of dawn were the unfolding of God's gracious purposes in the types and promises of the Old Testament; its sunburst was when Jesus was born in Bethlehem, and we are now in the morning of a bright and glorious day whose sun, when it reaches the zenith, will shine there forever, for then there shall be no night.

V. 3.—"God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." The example of the Creator is to be imitated by the creature. Our spiritual interests demand Sabbath rest and spiritual activity. God made the seventh part of our time a holy day, and attached to its right keeping the promise of abundant blessings.

Lessons for To-day.

1. We were made to be like God.
2. We were made to do God's work in the world.
3. So far as we fail to do these things we ourselves are failures.
4. God has blessed us by giving us life
5. God has blessed us by placing us in families.
6. God has blessed us by prospering our labors.
7. God has blessed us by giving us the Sabbath rest.
8. REMEMBER NOW THY CREATOR

Lost in the Christmas Storm by the Hudson.

BY EDWARD A. RAND.

HARK!

Somebody is crying "Help!" in the big forest back of Jacob Allendorf's farm house. Somebody who has been fighting the snow-drifts and the dark and the cold, and weary, benumbed, helpless, is ready to sink at the foot of the old pine against which he leans.

"If I had known this," he murmured, "I would have taken the road. Foolish to try to cross the mountain. In pleasant weather it is tiresome enough. It was foolish to try it now. Can't hold out much longer, oh, I can't. Once more!" He raised his voice and shouted, "Help-p-p-p!"

The only answer was the wind roaring through the tops of the forest, vast and dreary, while the sound of falling branches, burdened with snow, added new notes of alarm to the storm-chorus raging overhead. The traveller, leaning against the pine tree, looked up confusedly as if he feared an avalanche of wood and snow might crash down upon him. He had already been struck and wounded. He was fast reaching that state of mind where utter carelessness would be the attitude toward the wind, the snow, the dark, death itself.

How very different was the scene in the farm house of Jacob Allendorf! Plump Anna Allendorf sat knitting by a big, dancing, open wood-fire, while her father was reading his weekly paper that had been brought by stage from New York, for the locomotive was not then startling with its rattle and roar or far-echoing shriek the drowsy solitude of the Highlands of the Hudson. Anna, since her mother's death, had been housekeeper for her father, and the day's duties were now cared for. The children were in bed. The dogs and cats were in their quarters. It was the day before Christmas, and everything had been made ready for that festival. Pies were in the pantry, and in the "cold closet" were the poultry waiting to make the fire's warm acquaintance the next day. Santa Claus' arrival was duly expected. Indeed, it would soon be nine o'clock, when the children had made up their minds he would certainly arrive. Anna had been hoping that somebody else would come about that time, even John Brinkerhoff, a stalwart young yeoman, and the betrothed of Anna.

"Afraid John won't come in this storm," she had said to herself a hundred times, and fifty times—it seemed to Jacob Allendorf—she had already gone to the door to see if there were any sign of clearing weather.

"I hope John won't come through the forest," she had also remarked to herself. "Much better to try it by the road."

Once she had ventured out into the yard with her broom-handle and measured the depth of the snow. At that time she had said, looking toward the grim, roaring woods, "I do hope John won't try the forest."

If this moment, while knitting by the open fire, she could have heard that forest-cry, how it would have startled her! The only thing to startle her was her father's declaration in his slow, ponderous way, "I think, Anna, I had better go down to the ferry."

"What for, father? The river is frozen up."

"But you know, Anna, if anybody should be crossing on the ice, coming up the river, say, they might be confused in this storm and need help."

"Oh, yes, if they were strangers. I forgot that."

Anna's thoughts were only on the muscular yeoman who might possibly arrive by way of the forest behind the farm house.

As Jacob was ferryman in summer, he naturally felt some burden of responsibility in winter, and especially when this Christmas storm was shaking out of the feather-bags in the sky all their filmy contents, burying the river and the roads under such deep, smothering drifts.

"Before you go I have something to say, father."

"It is about John," thought Jacob. "I have been expecting it. She wants to be married by New Year's if Domine Wykoff gets back from Holland."

No; Anna just then was not thinking of John. There had been a little trouble between her and Dorothea Hasbrouck on the other side of the Hudson. Dorothea had made the trouble, but Dorothea having kindled the fire, Anna was ready to extinguish it in her own loving, forgiving way. Anna was very tolerant and patient, of very deep, tender affection, and an exceeding hard person to quarrel with. Dorothea was a handsome, warm-hearted girl, but her feelings were quick and her tongue moved as rapidly as her feelings. She was sorry for the pain she had given Anna, and was at heart anxious to confess her fault, but pride was stronger than duty just now.

"Father," said Anna, "if a person does you an injury, should you wait before they confess it—"

"What, Anna?" said the farmer, now bundled up for the storm, his round, red face glowing amid its warm wrappings.

"Why, Christmas night makes you think of such things, of people with whom we may be at variance. We ought to be forgiving, you know, and especially Christmas time."

The farmer gave an impatient turn toward the door.

"Well," he said, "what then?"

"If anybody did you harm, should you hold off and have nothing to do with them—"

She hesitated. She certainly was not withdrawing herself from Dorothea, but Dorothea was silent behind a wall of cool reserve, and it worried Anna, whose heart was tuneful with echoes of the angels' Christmas song of peace and good will, and wished others to know it. But what was the matter with Jacob Allendorf?

"Anna, I think a person ought to show that they are sorry," he said, sternly. "Prove it, say it, live it, and after that, after that, we will talk about forgiveness. Anna, you mean Peter! When the young man, wherever he is, shall have shown he is sorry, his father will meet him with the spirit of reconciliation."

The next moment he was thumping out of the room, fiercely stamping along the passageway leading to the outside door, and, opening it, went hurriedly out into the night. He had a habit of turning to look with complacency upon his farm house, built low and broad like himself. All his buildings had an aspect of great comfort and plenty. He did not turn to look back to-night, as was his custom even in the dark, but plunged riverward through the growing drifts, muttering to himself. The astonished Anna by the open fire said aloud: "Why, I did not mean to offend father! Peter? I did not mean Peter, but Dorothea. Peter, where is he?"

And then the affection of the great-hearted girl went out into the dark, wild night, seeking for this brother astray, even as a love magnified and infinite feels down through the depths into which a lost race has sunk, yearning to bring back all souls to itself.

"Peter!" she said again. "I have thought of Peter, but not when father spoke."

How could she help thinking some time of the absent and erring, and especially how could she help it Christmas eve, that commemorates the descent of God's measureless love to this earth? If God thought of the lost members of that family created by Him, how can we, if His children, forget any of our circle who are wanderers under a pitiless sky and over a frozen earth?

"Oh, Peter, Peter!" sighed Anna, and then the thought of her brother, of his waywardness, of a quarrel between him and his father, of his abandonment of home! Jacob Allendorf would not willingly speak of Peter. He felt disgraced. He thought of the old family name that had come from Holland, that had been borne in pride up this very Hudson river, a line of honorable descent, and now Peter seemed to have stained that shining line all the way back to the land over the seas. Forgive Peter? Jacob Allendorf would forgive when Peter had come home, stayed at home, and after long probation proved his sincerity.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Anna. She rose, went to the window and looked out. Only the dark, and the roar of the wind, and the white flakes on the little, old-fashioned panes! Then she went to the children's room and looked upon their peaceful, happy faces.

"They fancied Santa Claus would come at nine, bringing their presents, and told father his gift also would come. Dear little things!" murmured Anna. She returned to her knitting work by the fire, but somehow could not be at ease.

"I wish John would come!" she said, looking at the clock. She could not refrain from going to the outside door, murmuring, "I hope he will not come through the forest," when suddenly she started back and said, "Hark!" What did she hear? Listening intently, trying to separate the jargon of the storm into its separate notes, distinguishing the fall of the breaking boughs from the roar in the tree-tops, she heard something else.

"Help-p-p!"

"Oh, oh! There is someone calling; someone down in the Hollow! Oh, pity, pity, did John start to come that way? Oh, has he met with an accident, and did a tree fall on him? Where is father, oh where is father?" cried Anna in her fright. She knew what she must do. Her father might not be back for an hour. She must take a lantern, the two dogs, Hans and Max, and go herself into the forest.

"There is no other way," said Anna. "The trouble is in the Hollow."

The Hollow was a depression in the great forest not far from the farm house. It was here that the pilgrim astray had raised his pitiful cries. If he had gone a little way farther, he might from the rim of the Hollow have seen the lighted windows of the farm house. But was he able to go that distance? Was it exhaustion in the storm, or had he met with a violent blow from the falling limbs of the old trees? Anna was wondering how it might be as she stumbled on through the deep snow, now and then calling, "John-n-n!" while the dogs floundered ahead, barking violently.

"Oh, there he is!" she shrieked, as down in the Hollow she saw a dark form crouching against a pine. "Had he been struck and injured by a limb that the storm had wrenched off and thrown at him?" she wondered.

"Oh!" sighed Anna. "How did you come here? Lean on me," she added, speaking encouragingly. "Oh, how thankful I am that I am strong! Go ahead, Hans! Go ahead, Max! Break out the way for us!" And so struggling, lifting, encouraging, brave Anna Allendorf led her companion into the farm house.

"Nine o'clock!" she thought, looking at the clock. She was quickly making him comfortable, when the door opened and her father entered. His stormy mood had now spent its strength. He was saying in his heart that he would be cheerful and not spoil Anna's Christmas eve.

"'Most time for Santa Claus to be here. Nine o'clock, Anna,—" he was saying.

He stopped. In sudden astonishment he looked at the rescued man.

"Yes, father," said Anna, soberly, but rising and going to her father and laying a hand tenderly on his shoulder, "and here is your gift. The Lord has sent it. You won't refuse it room in your house and heart."

"Oh, Peter, Peter!" cried Jacob, throwing himself down at the side of his son, and, like the father in the Gospel, welcoming home the prodigal. The barriers of pride gave way in a moment like strong dams before the onset of the freshet. And John? Where was he?

John did come that night, after all. He came by the road, safe, though late, having been detained by work at home.

He had struggled hard to get here, but Jacob rewarded him by saying that night that he and Anna should be joined on New Year's if the domine came home in season. He did return seasonably, and not only united John and Anna, but Peter and Dorothea, to whom the absent heir of Jacob Allendorf had long been attached, and that affection now suddenly flowered into those blossoms that only grow around hymen's altar.

A Remarkable Barometric Depression.

THE following is taken from the Democrat and Chronicle, of Rochester, N. Y., of December 10th, which gives special attention to meteorological phenomena and generally forms unusually judicious conclusions:

"The following barometer readings telegraphed from London to the New York Herald give some indication of the terrific character of the storm which has devastated the British coast":

The meteorological office gives the following data in connection with the storm: The barometric readings in London were—11 P.M., Tuesday, 29.50; 1 A.M., Wednesday, 29.46; 4 A.M., 29.18; 6 A.M., 28.60; 9 A.M., 28.96; 12 M., 28.55; 4 P.M., 28.40; 8 P.M., 28.35. The final reading was thus the lowest ever recorded in London.

The following data were also reported at Liverpool: 27.845, at 9 P.M., at Ramsey, Isle of Man, 27.45 at 3.30 P.M., and at Bradford, 27.556, at 8.40 P.M. on Wednesday.

"As Liverpool is at sea level, the barometer readings are remarkable. The terrific character of the cyclone and the electric discharges through its vortex and on its borders fairly account for the great magnetic disturbance on Wednesday in this city. On Tuesday night lunar halos were visible in the United Kingdom and an aurora at Stornoway."

This atmospheric disturbance had been preceded by a development of bright and distinct faculæ on the sun. The occasional red sunsets recently may indicate some increase of solar activity.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

....THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION met at the Synod's Rooms Monday morning. An interesting paper was read by the Rev. David Waters, D.D., on "The Blood Covenant." A paper will be read next Monday on "The Future of Our Church, West," by the Rev. J. W. Warnshuis, of Passaic, N. J.

....FISHKILL-ON-THE-HUDSON, N. Y.—The Reformed Church have generously granted their pastor, Rev. Charles W. Fritts, leave of absence for an extended tour of Egypt and Palestine. He expects to sail on the 12th of January.

....A PRAISEWORTHY EFFORT.—The German church in Plainfield, N. J., is making a heroic effort to obtain a suitable house of worship. It is something they have never had, and for more than a year they have been without even the semblance of one. They are now striving to erect a building of brick, 30 by 50 feet, capable of seating 200 persons, with a basement containing class-rooms and accommodations for about 180 children. The building, a neat and tasteful one, will cost about $6,000, without the furniture and the cost of the lots. They have raised thus far about $3,800.

They held a very successful fair last week, which realized over $700 for them. It clearly showed that they had friends, and that the German residents of Plainfield were ready to invest their money, as well as strenuous efforts, to secure the house of God for themselves and their children. They need the practical sympathy of all who love the cause of the Master and who enjoy lending a helping hand to a worthy people whose unaided effort cannot secure the great boon for which they are striving. Who will aid them? COR. SEC.

....NEW YORK.—Manor Chapel, 348 West 26th street. At the communion in November eight persons were received into our church, all but one on confession of faith. There has been an unbroken interest in Manor Chapel for several years, every communion bearing witness in the reception of some new members.

As a mission chapel under the care of the South Church, our contributions to church work have not been large, but have grown each year, until this year's collections, exclusive of Sunday-school and special offerings, aggregate about $700. Far from being discouraged, our people are talking of increasing the collections to $1,000 next year, and are hoping for independent church life before many years.

To show the spirit of our people, old and young, let me give an account of our Christmas boxes sent West recently. The South Church has always provided very generously for her mission school at Christmas. In fulfilment of the Scripture injunction, "Freely ye have received, freely give," we asked our Sunday-school to bring in their offerings of money, toys, books and picture cards, that we might make happy some Western Sunday-school.

On the day appointed the presents were brought by a large number of the scholars. One Infant Class scholar was saving pennies to buy shoes for her doll, and hearing our plea for the Christmas box, she decided to bring us her pennies, amounting to 35 cents, and this sacrifice was willingly and gladly made.

Four hundred presents, besides many picture papers, were sent in two boxes, one to Dakota and one to Michigan. And this from one of our so-called mission schools of New York! We do not report this work in any boastful spirit, but to show the self-help and the benevolence which can be developed with most gratifying results among the poor people of this city. What they give in these free-will offerings is worth far more to them than what they get.

....HARLEM, N. Y. CITY.—The Second Church, the Rev. George H. Smyth, pastor, on Sabbath, Dec. 12th, received an addition of sixty-five to the membership. Twenty-five made confession of faith, of whom twenty were from the Bible school of the church, under the superintendence of Mr. Frank A. Ferris, and one was a gentleman of 60 years. Forty-five were received by letter from Reformed churches and six other denominations. The pastor welcomed these new members, descending from the pulpit to greet them with warm words and the right hand of Christian fellowship. He stooped to kiss his dear son of ten years who was among those making confession of their faith, and was deeply affected. Many of the congregation mingled their tears with the pastor's in joy over the large ingathering, easily realizing, as he remarked after the communion which followed, how this might be the happiest day of his life. In October forty-seven had been received, making one hundred and twelve since the opening of the Second Church. At the First Church, where the Rev. Dr. Elmendorf is laboring, forty-one have been welcomed during the same period; making one hundred and fifty-three accessions this autumn to the two churches.

....SCHENECTADY, N. Y.—The Rev. Mr. Sewall, for twelve years pastor of the Congregational Church of Williamstown, Mass., has had under consideration the unanimous call of the First Church, and has signified his acceptance. He could hardly have a more interesting and important charge, and we understand that the people are delighted with his coming. He takes charge at the first of the new year. Mr. Sewall has been an especial favorite with the Faculty and students of Williams College, as well as with his parish, and is esteemed for his rare wisdom and devotion as well as his mental gifts. He declined some years ago a call to one of our other leading churches. We bespeak him welcome and wish him large success.

...THE MADISON AVENUE REFORMED CHURCH, NEW YORK.—Dr. Abbott E. Kittredge has ministered to this church about four months. At almost the very opening of his service the Lord's Supper was administered and thirty-three persons were received. Last Lord's day, the 19th inst., the second communion season brought in seventy-two more, while during these months the dismissions of members have been very few.

....THE NORTHWESTERN CLASSICAL ACADEMY, at Orange City, Iowa, is in need of a library, and asks through one of its devoted teachers for books. The plea sent to the INTELLIGENCER says: "It seems to me if our pastors and many other Christians in the East knew how happy we would be if we could have a library, each and every one would gladly make up a chest, large or small, of books no longer or hardly ever looked into and send it to us as a New Year's gift." Some have books of permanent value which they have outgrown, but which are just what these young students need. Why not send them to Orange City?

....KERHONKSON, N. Y.—The Rev. Mr. Darrach acknowledges packages of papers, magazines or books from the following sources since his last report: R. A. Bergen, Central Valley, N. Y.; East Fishkill; Mrs. Asa Lefevre, New Paltz; Miss F. K. Holmes, Brooklyn; Mrs. G. Ludlow, Canajoharie; Peekskill; Rev. Dr. Myers, Newburgh; Rev. W. W. Schomp, Stone Ridge; Mrs. F. H. Bagley, New Brighton, N. Y.; THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, and two or three from unknown friends. He writes: "The canal is locked fast in thick ice this morning and all the poor boatmen are not out of it yet. Quite a number are frozen up with their loaded boats. The papers have all been distributed among them, and most of the books and magazines, loaned on the boats through the season, have been returned. The seed is sown and the Lord of the harvest will add His blessing. The families in this place are still using the library, and it is to them, especially to the children, a great source of pleasure and profit." Although pastor Darrach does not say so, it is reasonably certain that these boatmen and their families would be very thankful for a fresh supply of magazines and books to occupy the hours of enforced idleness which the winter imposes. Perhaps the reason why he did not ask for fresh reading matter was that he had been quite unwell for a month, and was about to seek for recovery through rest.

....THOUSAND ISLES, N. Y.—The Consistory of the Reformed Church, in parting with their pastor, the Rev. E. C. Lawrence, who has accepted a call to a Presbyterian church, adopted a minute, in which they bear testimony to his faithfulness in the discharge of his pastoral duties, especially his visitation of the poor, the sick and afflicted; his efficiency in the work of preaching the Gospel; his scholarly attainments; and his gentlemanly deportment in all his intercourse with them.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—The Fifth Church of Grand Rapids are building a parsonage and have resolved to recall their petition for aid to the Board of Domestic Missions and to help themselves....Rev. H. Van der Ploeg, of Fulton, Ill., declines the call to Vriesland, Mich....The new Church of Englewood, Ill., has called Rev. A. Wormser, of Cedar Grove, Wis. The First Church of Grand Haven has also called Rev. A. Wormser....The Sixth Church of Paterson, N. J., has called a minister from the Netherlands.

Gleanings from Our Exchanges.

....In view of the increasing membership of Hope Church, Holland, Mich., the Consistory has been enlarged by the addition of one elder and one deacon.

....The Second Church of Somerville, N. J., realized a net income of $600 from a recent festival. This sum goes into the building fund for a new church.

....On Sunday morning, December 12th, a large congregation attended the last services by the Rev. G. J. Van Neste as pastor of the Church of Kiskatom, N. Y. He preached on Paul's farewell to the Ephesian elders in Acts 20: 17-38. The following statements of his ministry of seven years were given:

About a thousand sermons and expositions of God's Word, besides 65 funeral sermons and various addresses in Sunday-schools and prayer-meetings; 32 persons confessed their faith in Christ and 27 were received from other churches; 58 children were baptized and 40 couples were united in marriage; $1,885.13 was contributed for beneficence, and $6,255.99 for the support of the Church at home. The interior and exterior of the parsonage and church have been renewed and painted, with important additions to both. Twelve excellent horse sheds have been built and "grace the church surroundings," as the pastor remarked, and as one said, "are worth a seven-years' ministry." The church is in a prosperous state. When the pastor presented his letter of resignation to the Consistory, the following action was taken unanimously:

"Resolved, That while it is with deep regret we part with our pastor, we shall always delight to hold in kind remembrance his work and labor of love with us for the past seven years, a period of one year longer than that of any other pastorate in the history of this Church. In temporal and spiritual things, we have been greatly prospered, by God's blessing, under his ministry; and especially has the benevolent work of the church greatly increased. We shall follow him to his new field of labor with our prayers and best wishes, and trust the Lord may have for him in store many years of great usefulness."

....The ladies of the Church of Fishkill-on-Hudson cleared $300 by their fair last week.

Thanksgiving Day in Japan.

IN the first place it is to be noticed that the Rev. George Müller and wife arrived at Yokohama on Saturday, November 20th, from their tour in India, China and Australia. The rumors of the death of Mr. Müller are therefore disproved.

The Japanese have a day of national thanksgiving, called the feast of new rice, which is everywhere observed as a holiday. The Tokyo Missionary Conference recently resolved that this day should be observed by the Christian churches instead of the American Thanksgiving day which they have been keeping for some years. It fell this year on Tuesday, November 23d. The Japan Gazette of the evening of that day has the following account of the services:

"The observance of the Japanese National Thanksgiving, as announced, took place at nine o'clock this A.M. at the Union Church, representatives of five native churches filling the large edifice to its utmost capacity. The exercises were most earnestly participated in by leading members of the various churches. The mercies of the year and the importance and nature of the thanksgiving were severally dwelt upon. At 11 A.M. the foreign congregation began to assemble, and a place was provided for them by the withdrawal of the young and many elderly persons. The ladies and schools of the city were well represented, and a large number of gentlemen, considering it was mail day, were present. Among the latter, several of the officers of the United States man-of-war "Marion" were observed in the audience. Mr. Müller, attended by his lady, took the pulpit at 11 o'clock, and after a hymn had been sung, and a prayer offered, commenced his address, speaking about 40 minutes, through an interpreter, to his Japanese audience. He announced his willingness to meet them at a future time to tell them especially of his orphanage work, but to-day, in view of their protracted services, would tell them the secret of a happy Christian life. This he did in a most impressive and instructive manner, drawn from his own personal experience for three-score years, leaving an impression of faith in God, and reliance upon His Word and of its blessed results, that cannot fail to be of the greatest benefit to all his hearers. The services were closed with an impressive prayer in Japanese by the native pastor of the church where the services were held. The Doxology, 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow,' was heartily joined in by all present in both languages, to the tune of 'The Old Hundredth;' and the benediction was pronounced by the venerable minister, Mr. Müller."

City Evangelization.

AN important meeting in relation to evangelistic work in this city was held a fortnight ago by representatives of the Presbyterian churches of the city. The character of the attendance and what was said and done, should be instructive and stimulating. The Evangelist makes this report:

"Last week a large number of ministers and elders responded to Dr. John Hall's invitation to gather at his house to consider the subject of Church Extension in New York city. The meeting was addressed by Drs. Hall, George Alexander, and Crosby, by Rev. Messrs. Chambers and Hoadly of the ministry, and by Messrs Skidmore, Van Orden, Shepard, and Jessup of the laity. The burden of the addresses was the need of money, the necessity of discarding the name "Mission Chapel," and of planting genuine churches, of avoiding church debts, of creating in new organizations the sense of responsibility for self-support, and a desire to avoid extravagance. Mr. Morris K. Jesup suggested the raising of a working capital of at least $100,000, out of which money could be loaned to new enterprises, and paid back or loaned again many times over. Mr. Van Orden laid stress upon the great importance of buying sites and effecting organizations in quarters of the city where population is gradually massing. He made the striking assertion that during our Civil War, Presbyterians had given to the country 10,000 lives and $200,000,000, and pleaded for men and money in the Master's cause. Dr. Crosby, while he thought Presbyterianism had kept up its past ratio with the population in numbers of worshippers, if not in the number of churches, regarded the future of New York as demanding timely action, and suggested that a map of the city be prepared, showing the points already occupied and needing to be occupied, and circulated through all the churches. Dr. Hall made very encouraging comments on the work of the French, German and Bohemian churches in the city. The conference was harmonious and useful, fixing the attention of leaders in the Church on the call to Presbyterians, while they rejoice in the labors of fellow-Christians of every name, to enlarge their own work and do their own share towards saving the city from godless ness and its constant consequence, immorality. To effect amply the object in view, we think the sum named as working capital should be doubled, a wide discretion and large authority in regard to locating churches should be given to the Church Extension Committee, and Presbyterial supervision wisely exercised should be loyally acquiesced in."

The General Outlook.

....Number 12 of the Maandbericht of the Netherland's Missionary Society reverts to the motto "Trust in God," with which they began the year, and gratefully commemorates the reward of their faith. No brilliant results have appeared in the field they cultivate, but there has been steady work and steady progress. The number contains an account of the baptism of two old persons at Kesambe who, after long delay and amid much opposition from kindred and friends, were hopefully converted. The confession of the old heathen was striking. "Ah, I have been so bad, so bad through and through. I let my mother die without troubling myself about her. However much she suffered I paid no attention. And now it vexes me sorely." The sin of omission seems to have struck down deep into his awakened conscience.

....The November Maandbericht of the Netherland's Missionary Society is occupied mainly with an account of the veteran missionary, Luyke, who died last July in his 88th year. Born at Amsterdam in 1798, he began life as a baker's servant, but soon after reaching manhood gave himself to service among the heathen. The Amsterdam brethren allowed him three years of preparation, and in 1827 he set out for the East Indies, where he continued for sixty years in continuous activity, never even expressing a wish to return to his native land. He had a strong physical constitution, and was able to endure hardship, privation, weariness and disappointment without being overcome. His fidelity was exemplary. He had to wait like Jacob seven years before his betrothed could join him at Letti, and then the happy marriage, after only eight years, was broken by her death. But he continued his chosen work, laboring even to the last; and when the end came quickly fell asleep, leaving behind him an example of faith, perseverance, consistency and holy living not often surpassed.

....Rev. B. Fay Mills, a Presbyterian minister, who devotes himself largely to evangelistic work, has been holding meetings in Morristown, N. J., with the active co-operation of the Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists, and with sympathy from the Low Church Episcopalians. It is believed that so far as many as 350 conversions had occurred.

....The Methodist Mission in Utah has received during the past year 168 members, 61 of whom had been Mormons.

....When the Rev. George Brown, of the Methodist Mission to New Britain, a large island off the coast of New Guinea, started that mission five years ago, the native savages attacked and killed some of his Fijian teachers whom he took with him. When he recently left the island for a visit to England, 500 of the natives gathered to show their esteem for him and loaded him with presents.

....Mr. Spurgeon says of the Salvation Army: "If it were wiped out of London, 5,000 extra policemen could not fill its place in the repression of crime and disorder."

....At the close of the evening session of the Medical Students' Missionary Conference held on Dec. 12th, at the Young Men's Christian Association building of this city, seventeen men pledged themselves, God permitting, to go as foreign missionaries; of this number fifteen were medical students.

....As a result of union meetings held at Martin's Ferry, Ohio, under the leadership of Rev. Alexander Patterson, an evangelist, 111 persons have been added to the Presbyterian Church of that place.

....There are 100,000 Jews who are Christians, though there are only 250 missionaries to the Jews in the world.

....The "Local Preachers' College" is a new thing in Methodism, and like most other Methodist institutions, it is believed to have come into being at the providential hour and to meet new and pressing needs. At the recent Local Preachers' Convention a plan of endowment was adopted.

....The net increase of the membership of the Missouri Methodist Conference the last year was 4,354. There were altogether 7,000 conversions.

....Last year there was a net gain of eight Congregational churches in California, making a total of 114 in the State.

....A new Baptist church has been erected and dedicated on the site of the building where Jefferson Davis was born.

....The Roman Catholic priests of Cincinnati have been ordered by Archbishop Elder to call off the singers of Holy Mother Church, who may be employed in Protestant and Jewish churches as members of choirs. The circular pronounces the services of the churches heretical, and Roman Catholics commit sin by engaging in them. The Archbishop, therefore, directed all pastors to notify members of their congregations or choirs, that whosoever takes part in the Hebrew or Protestant service is guilty of sin, and by persisting in so doing would deprive him or herself of the sacraments of the Church. The Archbishop further made a provision, that if persons were in poverty and earned their living by their vocal talents, they would have to consult him, the Archbishop, and he would carefully consider their cases and circumstances.

In commenting on this action of the Archbishop, Rabbi Wise, of Cincinnati, is reported in the Herald and Presbyter as having said to his people: "If a Sister of the Poor comes to us for aid and support of their charitable objects, why couldn't it be said to them, 'As we are but sinners and erroneous in our worship, hadn't you better ask for support somewhere else?' Suppose it should be said that none of our girls should ever again be sent to their convents or their schools, and they should be allowed to support themselves in their own faith. Such things might easily happen. I don't say they will happen, but they might easily happen. This retaliation could even go further. Why, if our worship is erroneous and sinful, should Catholic domestics remain in our homes? If our worship is sinful and corruptive, surely the home atmosphere must be more so, and it would not be proper to have these Catholic domestics exposed to any such sinful influences."

....The Superior of the Oblate Fathers has announced that no Knight of Labor will be allowed to partake of the sacrament.

....The Rev. Mr. Spurgeon has gone to Mentone to spend the winter.

....Contributions to the German Hospital, of Philadelphia, on Thanksgiving day amounted to $9,000 cash, and $1,800 in goods.

....Philadelphia has 637 churches, which own property valued at $23,195,726, and pay their pastors annually $844,834.

....Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, who is good authority, believes that "the only solution of the problem of Indian civilization is in their concentration, by vesting them with individual rights of property, and by compelling them to live by their own labor."

....General William Booth, of the Salvation Army, made his farewell address in the Everett Assembly Rooms, Brooklyn, Tuesday evening, a fortnight ago. A number of the pastors of Brooklyn were present by invitation. General Booth rapidly sketched the growth and progress of the army. In the first 12 years only 26 corps were formed and only 36 salaried officers were employed. Now there were 1,700 corps and 4,000 officers. The work had spread in nineteen countries. At the present rate of increase the army would soon possess the earth. Its work was to try to save souls among people so low down that the churches did not reach them.

When asked why he wore a red vest, General Booth replied: "It grew on us. We began by wearing a small badge to know each other. Then it became bigger and bigger, till some of the officers dressed in red from top to toe. I live and sleep in red. I hope to die and be buried in it, and go to glory in it."

....The Methodist Social Union of Chicago held its December meeting at the Tremont House. Mr. William Deering, who is extensively engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements, opened the debate. His paper dealt with the facts of production, and, among other things, he showed that four-fifths of the value of the immense amount of goods manufactured in the country is paid out in wages. He argued against the property theories of Mr. George, showing them to be impracticable. The national yearly savings amount to $100,000,000, and the nation spends annually $900,000,000 for intoxicating drinks. On an average, among workingmen, one hour and a half of each day's labor of ten hours goes to pay for strong drink. The co-operative system is fair and just, and may be gradually introduced. The real interests of the workman are damaged by labor organizations, strikes and boycotts. The liquor tax on the workingman is his greatest foe. The speaker favored churches, good schools, the social recognition of workmen, and the decrease in the importation of foreign labor, as the best means of bettering the condition of workmen.

....During the past six years, in Southern Dakota, a Presbyterian church has been organized for every month, and a church building has been erected for every other month. Five colleges and academy halls have been built.

....Dr. and Mrs. Sturge, formerly of Siam, are now engaged in work among the Japanese in San Francisco. They have a large evening school, and several come to the home of Dr. Sturge, during the day, to be taught by his wife. The work under their leadership is most hopeful.

....An exchange says: "The Jews are alking of changing their Sabbath to our Sunday, beginning with the year 1900. The matter is exciting much attention in England."

....During the past twelve months, 29 German Baptist churches have been recognized, 26 meeting-houses dedicated. The present number of churches is 161; membership, 13,000. There are 55 on the home field, assisted by the American Baptist Home Missionary Society.

....The Montreal Hackmen's Union has issued a circular agreeing to abstain from labor on Sunday in future, and requesting all hackmen not to bring out their carriages for hire on Suuday. The circular closes, "God help us to keep steadfast in this resolution."

Alleluia! Christ Is Born.

BY WILLIAM WHITE.

LISTEN to the rush of wings;
Lo! the advent herald sings,
Sings of peace o'er earth and sea,
Grand, celestial harmony;
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Angels descant music sweet,
Heaven and earth in marriage meet,
Love divine now stoops to earth,
Lo! they hymn the Saviour's birth;
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Lo! a babe in Bethlehem,
Whom the angels diadem;
Him the shepherds joyful greet,
As they worship at His feet;
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Look, a guiding star is seen,
Leading wise men by its sheen
To the place where Jesus lies
'Neath the pale, blue Eastern skies
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Bright our star of hope appears,
Seraph's songs fall on our ears;
Bring we gifts of spice and gold
Let our hearts the Christ enfold;
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Harp and viol, organ, lute,
Let no voice on earth be mute;
Raise we now our carol high,
Heaven's magnificat outvie;
Alleluia! Christ is born.

Bertha's Trust.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

Part Second.

WHEN Bertha returned home to her father and told him all that had happened, and what the young ladies had asked her to do, the poor shoemaker found it difficult to comprehend what was wanted of the child. Even with what she had herself seen and heard, Bertha had but an imperfect idea of what it all meant. Her father, without the slightest idea of what tableaux might be, could form no idea of this entertainment from her account. Her explanations only intensified the mystery as to why, if she stood on a platform before so many guests, it was desirable to do so in a dress all tattered and torn.

In this most foggy mental atmosphere he could only seize upon the prominent fact, that Mrs. Weaver had requested Bertha to come to her house at a certain hour that evening, and that Bertha wanted to go. That was enough. The child should, in this case, do as she wished. He would himself take her there, and call for her again at the hour appointed by Mrs. Weaver for her to return home. As to its being a matter of dollars or cents, that never entered his thoughts. Had anything of that nature been suggested he would have laughed at the idea of his little Bertha being capable of earning any money.

After what we have said of the child's earnest desire to earn something for her father's Christmas dinner, we need not add that to Bertha herself the harvest of pennies she expected to reap was an important factor in causing her to join in the performance of the evening. Dear papa, who worked so hard, if she could only earn a little for him how happy she would be! But then her expectations were very moderate, for a small sum went a long way in their simple housekeeping!

Bertha was possessed of much tact, quickness of perception, and natural grace of manner. There was nothing awkward or uncouth about her, and it was consequently not difficult to train her for the part she was to take.

So well did she acquit herself, so obedient was she to the wishes of the young ladies, that she rapidly ingratiated herself in their favor. She seemed intuitively to do and to be all they required. She was modest and retiring, and there was a certain appealing look in her eyes and gentleness in her manner which made her a general favorite. If Bertha had been an ambitious and designing girl in her teens, craving notice and admiration, she could not have gained more flattery than she unconsciously won by her childish innocence.

At the close of the tableaux, and while some of the performers were making some change in their dress before joining the company in the parlor, others gathered around little Bertha, caressing her, and chatting with her, as people are inclined to do to a precocious and interesting child. It is true, even if not commendable, that a pretty child will find favor where one equally deserving and needy is passed by unnoticed and uncared for. The young ladies encouraged Bertha to talk; they persuaded her to tell them about her home life, and innocently in her recital she told of her desire to provide a Christmas dinner for her father. They laughed at her simple idea of a fine dinner, when they heard from her that "pork chops" was the moderate provision to which she was looking forward. It required Mrs. Weaver's utmost tact to prevent the child from seeing the amusement she caused. A Christmas dinner of pork chops! Well, well!

Little did these rich people know of the frugality and economy which prevailed in the home of poor little Bertha. Of respectable poverty that hides its want, that does not hold out its hand to ask relief—of that they knew nothing. They only recognized the poverty that whined and begged in dirt and rags, that lived in filth, and frequented beer saloons, and is loathsome to behold.

Mrs. Weaver had intended, of course, to pay this child for the dress torn in the entertainment of the evening, and also to take this opportunity to add some gift for the father, whom she had known all her life to be an honest, hard-working man; one belonging to a respectable family, but not capable of earning much on account of his lameness, the result of a fall. This lameness had unfortunately disabled him from working his farm and obliged him to try this trade he had subsequently learned, to provide for his family.

The assembled company had become greatly interested in Bertha and expressed a desire to show it by assisting to provide for her Christmas dinner. Accordingly, the Fairy Queen, ever prompt at action, asked for King Saul's crown to pass round for a collection. But that proving to be, as she expressed it, "a crown without a crown," she took that of Queen Elizabeth, which was lined with a purple cap.

A generous offering was the result. The money, together with the tinsel crown into which it had been gathered, was placed in the child's hands. No queen ever felt herself richer, perhaps none was ever more happy than Bertha as she held the royal offering.

Her father had by this time called for her and was even now at the hall door awaiting her coming.

In haste she ran out to him to place her uncounted wealth in his care.

The servants of the house had been enjoying the tableaux from the hall door. The chagrin of the cook knew no bounds as she saw the money given to Bertha which, in her estimation, should have been the property of that "foine little girrul, Mary Ann," had justice been done by selecting her in her cotton velvet gown to act in the "tablers" instead of Bertha.

There was, however, a still greater surprise in reserve for them all. It was the exhibition of a trait almost unknown to the foreign element of our population, but not at all uncommon as a development of the sturdy independence of our native-born American people. Bertha, with sparkling eyes and glowing cheeks, had rushed to her father, holding out to him the crown in which lay her treasure.

"See, father," she had cried, "see what I've got! And it's all yours. You're to have a Christmas dinner! See what your little Bertha has earned!"

The shoemaker looked from the money to the child and then, puzzled and perplexed, at the money again. It was hard to disappoint the little girl, hard to bring tears to those bright eyes!

"You could scarcely have earned this, Bertha," he said.

"But the ladies and gentlemen gave it to me!" she exclaimed, speaking as if he thought she had stolen it.

"I don't doubt that my little Berthey. But why should they give you money? If you had had hard work to do and had earned thus much we would be but too happy to have it. But now it is charity, and we, you and I, Berthey, do not ask charity so long as I can work."

The glow abated, her countenance fell. The brightness all faded away.

"You have had play, not work," he continued. "Did all the rest who took part in the entertainment have money given them?" She remembered how she had resented the idea of being thought a little beggar girl, and the tears came to her eyes, for she was quick to feel either joy or sorrow; she stood with head sadly bowed, holding the crown which now seemed to her to have lost some of its lustre, as perhaps real crowns also do when disappointment comes.

The servants looked at the poor cobbler in wonder as if, in doing this, he must have some ulterior motive. The real nobleness of this Christian man was beyond their comprehension. The refining influence of the grace of God is needed even to appreciate a character such as this.

"What must I do, father?" she asked between her sobs.

"Take the money back to Mrs. Weaver, child, and thank her very kindly; but you cannot keep it. You may keep the crown if you will, as that is but a toy."

The child went slowly back. She did as she was told. The crown appeared very worthless now; robbed of its treasure it seemed tarnished, as if blushing for having assumed royalty! Perhaps even golden crowns, when they are without the treasures which are supposed to accompany them, look poor enough to those who hold them.

Bertha and her father walked home quietly together. Her toy crown had been filled with bonbons by the children, and a little basket of fruit, cake and nuts was carried for her by her father. These were for her. But it was for her father's sake that she had looked forward to having some money. It was that she might give him a Christmas dinner that she had so rejoiced over the coins that she had been obliged to return. Now he was none the richer and she had a torn dress—her best—and just a few dainties which he would not enjoy nor care to share with her. Poor little Bertha, like many a one of us, she felt that she had paid dear for a few hour's amusement. Although she was too young to moralize over it as an older person might have done, nevertheless she felt, as the French proverb says, "the play was not worth the candle."

As she went to her little bed that night, after saying her prayers, she began to think of what her father had said, that God knows best and that we could trust Him.

She did not feel now that she could trust Him as she felt when, full of hope and joy, she had accepted the crown and the money she thought she had earned. She began to question once more as to whether He did know what was best.

That is what we are all apt to do when God's ordering of events is not in accordance with our wishes. If Bertha had been old enough to talk of "mysterious Providences," as some people do, she would have called this such, for her intentions had all been kind and good, she had not been selfish, she had done all with a view to make her father happy, yet all her wishes had been baffled and all her good intentions frustrated.

Perhaps little Bertha's experience has been yours or mine at some time in our lives, has it not?

(To be concluded.)

The Eternal Kingdom of Christ.

IN 1 Corinthians 15: 24–28 it is written:

Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; when he shall have put down all rule, and all authority, and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.

It is asserted by some that this passage declares that the mediatorial kingdom of Christ will come to an end; we proceed, however, to show that the mediatorial dominion of Christ is universal and perpetual. Is not the unlimited extent of mediatorial power fairly declared by Paul in his description of the exaltation of Jesus Christ in the words, "gave him to be head over all things, to the Church?" Did not Christ in His last interview with His disciples say, "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth"? Did not John in vision hear the voice of many angels, of living creatures and the elders, echoing through the arches of the celestial temple, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto the Lamb forever and ever"? Who will have boldness to say that the essential and mediatorial kingdoms of Christ are not of equal extent. "All things are delivered to me of my Father;" "and hath put all things under his feet," are His words. Thus the mediatorial dominion includes everything in the universe but God the Father.

In his memorable description of the resurrection, in which the words we have quoted occur, the apostle confirms the fact that death came by man, and by man came also the resurrection of the dead. Death by Adam, the head of the covenant of works; life, by Christ, the head of the covenant of grace. The order of the resurrection has been determined by God; Christ the first, then the redeemed, and then the unforgiven sinner. "Then cometh the end when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God." The kingdom of Christ is extensive, including not only the Church, but the world, the strong man of sin. Christ must subordinate all things in the world to His glory. The time is at hand when intercession will cease. The enemies of the Church of Christ must meet their Judge, and the judgment administered to their opposing power. Paul is discussing the subject of Christ's awards to the enemies of the Church and of His work of redemption. "Now," says Dr. Owen, "the delivering up of the kingdom extends no farther than as unto what concerneth the exercise of Christ's mediatorial office, with respect unto the Church here below, and the enemies of it." Dr. Doddridge says, "to me, the kingdom to be given up appears to be the rule of this lower world, which will be then consumed." What candid Biblical scholar can object to this interpretation?

If this principle of interpretation is followed, the writer conceives it will be acknowledged that "the delivering up of the kingdom" does not teach the cessation of the mediatorial kingdom of Christ or the resignation of His commission as Mediator. It is only as Mediator the Son can be subject to the Father through eternity. Christ, personally considered, is in all things equal to God. Now, it is only in an official capacity that the idea of inferiority can be given to Him. He is "Jehovah's fellow" and "counts it no robbery to be equal with God." Subordination is inconsistent with the proper and essential Divinity of the Son; it is as mediator only that the Son is eternally subject to the Father, and His mediatorial office is perpetual.

At the end of time Christ abandons and gives over the world and His unsubjected enemies to the just judgment of heaven. The Greek word used signifies that Christ has brought the work for which He was commissioned on earth to completion—has presented it in its finished state, reported the state of things entrusted to Him. The evangelist Mark uses the same Greek word, "he putteth in the sickle because the harvest is ripe." Christ's work is ripe, complete, matured. When the world is brought to an end, the kingdom of the Messiah shall have grown to its completion and the work given to Him by the Father be finished. Then shall the redeemed, the sanctified and saved be known to all. They shall be gathered into the mansion of glory. Hell and its adherents, the enemies of righteousness and the wages of sin, that is, death, shall be in entire subjection. The providences of God in the world have been developed, consummated, have run their course. It is now, in the closing of time, that Christ, the Mediator, reports to the Father a full account of His mediatorial engagements, the achievements of the kingdom of grace, now to be elevated into the kingdom of glory, and receives acceptance and approbation. Who at such a time would rob Christ of His glory? Who would say to Him resign your mediatorial commission? Your mediatorial authority has ended, you are no longer to reign over the kingdom bought by your blood and gathered through your intercession and rule on high. Before such a demand, would not the angelic host and redeemed saints shout, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ, and He shall reign over them for ever and ever."

The truth of the perpetual reign of Christ is confirmed by the resplendent title given to Him, "King of Glory." After the conquest over the grave, Christ is represented as ascending to heaven, attended by myriads of angels demanding admission for Him into the heavenly temple, as they say, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in." Hear the inquiry from within: "Who is the king of glory?" and the reply, "The Lord of hosts, he is the king of glory." Paul tells who He is, "for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." It is an appropriate and an enduring title. All others, King of Zion, King of saints, King of nations, are to be merged into that of the King of glory.

The mediatorial work of Christ, to be properly rewarded, must extend beyond the consummation of all things. The work of Christ will not be finished till the final judgment has adjusted all wrongs. Can it be supposed that, in the day when Christ shall come into full possession, His mediatorial character is to cease? Is Christ to abandon the government of His kingdom when He has just completed it? Is Christ to step down from the summit of perfection, just reached? Is Christ to abdicate His throne of glory, just gained entire and secured to His subjects? Is the crown to be thrown from His brow, and the sceptre to drop from His hand? The truth of God and the faith of the saint say, His crown shall gleam brighter and his sceptre shall sway in perpetual sovereignty. Hence it is the countless host in glory join in everlasting praise to Him as mediator: "To the only wise God, our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and for ever, Amen."

Is it not impossible for the mediatorial character and dominion of Christ to cease; must not the connection betwixt the Redeemer and the redeemed be perpetual? Can the Redeemer forget the redeemed? By no means. The redeemed will not have lost their memory, their sense of gratitude and love, to Christ. Is not the union existing betwixt the divine and human natures of Christ inseparable? Is it not the eternal order that in the kingdom of glory it shall stand the monument of God's condescending grace and love for ever, bearing the inscription, "God-man, Emmanuel, God with us."

But how is the cessation of the mediatorial dominion of Christ to be attained? Is Christ to abdicate the throne, gained by suffering and death, of His own accord? The office and honor have been acquired by a great cost, and can the necessity of His resigning His position be shown to exist? Or the question is, shall Christ be dethroned, forcibly driven from power and degraded from office? It will not be by the redeemed, for His dominion is their safety and honor. Nor by angels, for they are subject to Him, and honor Him. Nor by devils, for they are enemies put beneath His feet. How unjust and unreasonable to say that it will be God the Father, who has given to Him power and glory, "length of days for ever and ever," who will depose Him!

Does not the promised reward to the faithful support the perpetuity of Christ's mediatorial kingdom? The redeemed are associated with Him in His kingdom of grace and glory. They have a regal dignity in connection with Jesus. "When the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones,"—"Shall reign in life by one Jesus Christ." "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne." We are told by the above that the saints are to reign in glory with Christ, as mediator. Is an objector to say, He is not to reign in glory after the consummation of all things? What! when the reign of the saints begins, is that of Christ to terminate? When they ascend the throne is Christ to abdicate?

If the saints in glory are also to receive communications, from whom shall it be but Christ? Their perfection is not identified with infinity. Although perfect in knowledge, holiness and love, these qualities are not of an infinite degree. They are free from the imperfections of the present state, and are progressing in the attributes of intellectual and moral existence. Angels advance in knowledge, and so the redeemed also do. What mortal can estimate the value of the communications of light, life, power and love made in the temple above to the redeemed! Through what channel do these communications pass? Through Christ, the king of glory. Christ, having brought them to the temple above, shall administer to them the fulness of His Father's house. "The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them."

The heavenly state is regarded also as a kingdom. As such, it must have a ruler. The kingdom of heaven is a mediatorial kingdom, and can be governed and ruled only by a mediatorial king. Thus it is that everlasting dominion is ascribed to Christ as mediator. "To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory, and majesty, and dominion, and power, both now and for ever,"—"To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever." Who has the presumption to maintain, from the earthly rostrum, that the mediatorial kingdom shall cease to exist when the redeemed saints in glory cry, "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever." It is a part of Christ's regal administration to rule and to reward in the kingdom of glory. There will be no cessation of the mediatorial kingdom. It is perpetual.

City Evangelization.

IN a paper of Mr. Pentecost, published in The Independent, there is much food for thought concerning the policy of our own churches with regard to the evangelization of this city.

Destitution and spiritual darkness, filth and raggedness in Africa, China, Japan or the Great West appeal to the missionary spirit of our day, while the cry from the masses of people all around us, who are living carelessly and recklessly without God and without Christ, without thought of death and eternity—this cry in heartrending tones to those who have ears to hear, "Come over and help us"—is either regarded with utter indifference or is considered as directed to the attention of an inferior class of workers; the Church apparently having no mission except that of taking care of itself; and alack-a-day, how many of them are in an invalid condition from that very reason. But the truth is, the work needs the very best powers of man, natural and acquired, to cope with it successfully.

In other work with the masses, is it the unintelligent, uncultivated, common-place man who wields the greatest influence?

The grace of God does refine and elevate if allowed full sway in the human heart, but it does not give a man tact, and address, and broad education, where he lacked them before, and it is unfair to leave such work, of vital import, to those who have the spirit but not the ability to cope with it.

As a friend said the other day: "There is hope for a church, not for one of those mission contrivances for patronizing the poorer people."

But to return to Mr. Pentecost. He quotes from Richard Baxter: "The work of the Church is exceedingly retarded by an unworthy retireness." In other words, he charged upon the Church of his day the sin of living a hermit life. "Christians," he said, "live like snails in the shell, and look but little around into the world, and know not the state of the world nor of the Church, nor much care to know it; but think it is with all the world as they fancy it is with themselves." Substitute "city" for "world," and how true a picture of the sentiment of to-day.

Mr. Pentecost further says: "The Church ought to be the home of believers only in the sense that the camp is the home of the army; a place in which the army is gathered, drilled, and cared for, in order to do the great work of conquest." If our Church is in any sense an army, it is more so in the sense of an army of occupation than of conquest. We plant churches in the new fields more as a home for believers who have removed from religious centres into the suburbs or the outlying wards, or on the frontiers, than as advanced guards of the conquering army. More thought and care are bestowed upon the question, "How can we best promote the prosperity of our Church?" than upon the question, "How can we make our Church more efficient in the work of evangelization?" In the cities vastly more care and work are expended on building finer and larger churches than in aggressive evangelistic work.

When any church ceases to be administered as a means for the evangelization of the city or community in the midst of which it is located, and becomes self-centered in its own prosperity, or makes its own establishment the chief end of its work, it ought to go down, for it has ceased to illustrate and manifest the spirit of Christ. May God remove that spirit in His people.

....At a late mission conference of the Methodist Church, South, in the Indian Territory, in response to an appeal for aid, many of the Indians gave all the money they had with them, and Indian girls took off their bracelets and other jewelry and threw them into the baskets, to be sold for the benefit of the missionary cause.

....Fifty years ago it was a capital offence for a Chinese to be a Christian; now the Gospel can be preached with more liberty in that Empire than in many places in Europe.

....As a result of the missionary work of the American Sunday-school Union during the past year, 1,618 new Sunday-schools had been planted where but few religious privileges of any kind had before existed; over 60,000 scholars were gathered into these schools; nearly 150,000 in other Sunday-schools were aided, and many hundreds of souls have given evidence of conversion.

....The Brooklyn Children's Aid Society reports: Total number of persons helped during the past year, 8,212; number of meals furnished (exclusive of Sea-Side Home), 92,187; number of garments distributed, 6,341; amount received in part payment by boys, etc., $4,367.93.

....The Danish Synod, at its recent session, passed a resolution to the effect that no secret society members should be tolerated in their churches.

....Several Methodist ministers and a number of lay workers in Chicago, Ill., prayed all night, Thursday night a week ago, in the Wabash Avenue Methodist Church, for an outpouring of the Holy Spirit on that city.

The Reading Room.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“THE WORD FOR THE DAY: Text, Hymn and Prayer for Every Day in the Year.” Compiled by A. J. A. R. The sub-title describes the contents, which are excellent. The selections have been made with care and in good taste. Over sixty blank pages are added at the end of the book, which may be used as a diary. The volume is gilt-edged, and neatly bound in drab cloth. (John Ireland.)

....Lee & Shepard have issued in a smaller size their illustrated hymns, popular in past years, now bound in boards with imitation alligator covers. There can be no question as to the beauty of the well-known hymns, “Abide with Me,” “Nearer, My God, to Thee,” “Rock of Ages,” and “My Faith Looks Up to Thee,” nor of the designs of the illustrations which accompany them. They would make pretty gifts for older scholars in the Sunday-school and Bible class.

....Much the same may be said of “'LONG SHORE,” a collection of sea views and marine devices, accompanied by selections of poetry and Scripture for each day in the month. They are printed on heavy board, with lithographed covers, and tied with silk cord. (S. E. Casino.)

....In “THE STORY OF THE SARACENS” (“Story of the Nations Series”), Mr. Arthur Gilman has condensed a library of books, as is indicated by the seventeen pages of bibliography which he appends to the volumes. By the Saracens he designates the followers of Mohammed. And his task leads him to tell the earlier legends of the desert tribes, the life and career of the Prophet and the reigns of his successors, the strifes of the separate kalifates, the invasions of Europe, the rise of dynasties, the growing supremacy of the Turks,—down to the fall of Bagdad. The story is full of romance and incident and striking personalities, and redolent of the atmosphere of Arabian Nights and Lalla Rookhs. It will be found second in charm of narrative to no one of the series. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“A HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.” By H. Morse Stephens. Vol. I. The merits of this work are that it is written from an impartial point of view, and that it makes careful use of all the new material brought to light within the last twenty or thirty years. It is written in a simple and pleasing style, and if the two volumes which are to appear within a twelvemonth correspond with this one, the work will be a most acceptable contribution to literature. It will furnish within reasonable limits a fair and intelligible account of the greatest convulsion of modern Europe, one, the effects of which continue to this day. Hitherto the subject has been treated by extremists on one side or the other. Mr. Stephens gives promise of a tone as serene and calm as that of Thucydides or Hallam. He does not load his pages with details, and yet contrives to make his account vivid and complete. (Charles Scribner's Sons.)

....“A BUDGET OF LETTERS FROM JAPAN.” By Arthur C. Maclay. A keen pair of eyes, an excellent judgment, and a power of description equal to that of the best of our newspaper correspondents, belong to the writer of these pages. For some five years he was a teacher of English in Japan, living in various cities of the empire, and visiting all the most noted spots. It was his custom to jot down impressions and experiences while they were fresh in his mind, and the book thus has a vividness and vitality which are uncommon elements in works of this class. The position and labor of missionaries are viewed in a critical way, but the writer finds that Japan owes more to Protestant missions than to any other force. The mercantile class is set forth in all its defects, and the harsh criticism it indulges in when Christian work is spoken of has its explanation in the life which too many foreigners lead in Japan.

We commend this book most warmly to all who want the truth as told by an eye-witness, the truth about a most attractive form of heathenism. What a country advanced in art and physical science but without the Bible can attain, Japan doubtless gained. But what its government and home life and religious forms really were, only one understands who closely contrasts them with the ideal standard of the Word of God. They are seen as doing little for true happiness or progress. We thank the author for doing this work so well, and hope this volume will have a wide circulation among all interested in Japanese history, customs, and daily life. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....“EMINENT AUTHORS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.” By Dr. Georg Brandes. Translated from the original by Rasmus B. Anderson. Dr. Brandes gives us in this book nine sketches of famous European writers, with many of whom he had a personal acquaintance. The names of Heyse, Paludan-Muller, and Irsen are not very familiar to Americans, while the works of Hans Christian Andersen, Mill, Renan, Tegner, Flaubert, and Bjornson have been more or less widely read on this side of the sea. The author strives after a literary portrait of each subject, and by sketching the life of each and connecting it with the work accomplished, the reader gains what we imagine is a very correct idea of the person presented. Dr. Brandes is keen in his discernment of special powers, and discriminates in a strong manner between the tendencies and desires of each mind. His criticisms of the works of the various writers are in the main excellent, though he seems to be guided rather by literary rules than by any ethical considerations. It is a book for critics to study. We owe something to the United States Minister to Denmark for translating so well this “book for the times.” (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.)

....“SIR PERCIVAL: A Story of the Past and of the Present.” By J. H. Shorthouse. A new book by the author of “John Inglesant” is an event. While not the equal of that great book, either in scope or power, this one is marked by the same qualities: the same minute and ineffaceable picturing, especially of localities with their scenery and architecture; the same weird and unworldly atmosphere, and mediæval tone and color; the same sweet and spiritual types of character; and the same singular admixture of a broad, evangelical, and genuine catholicism of spirit with a profound reverence for the “Anglican” pseudo-catholicism of our day. No wonder that Mr. Gladstone was the discoverer of “John Inglesant,” for I imagine their religious sympathies and status to be identical. “Sir Percival” is a parable and a poem, belonging (as the secondary title intimates) to all ages. It is an exceedingly beautiful production, which the reader will always retain in vivid memory. Its most important excellence and mission, however, are as a protest against the prevailing materialism of thought and life, and against the insolent “realism” of literature and art. It is an eloquent plea for the ideal, the spiritual, the mystical, the self-abnegating, the things that are unseen and eternal. (Macmillan & Co.)

....“CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE SCIENCE OF EDUCATION.” By William H. Payne. It is not easy to see how a teacher can study these thoughtful essays without deriving great benefit. They are certainly very valuable contributions to a most important science.

The author, who is Professor of the Science and Art of Teaching in Michigan University, shows a thorough familiarity with the literature of the subject and presents views which are evidently the outgrowth of mature study as well as of wide experience. He writes in a very attractive style, treats his subject in a very broad and comprehensive manner and criticizes opposing views with great fairness. The book is an excellent one and is worthy of thoughtful study. Many of its chapters are to be commended, not only for the important thoughts they present, but quite as much for the wholesome stimulus and encouragement they impart. (Harpers.)

....“RIPPLES IN THE TWILIGHT.” By J. R. Macduff, D.D. Thousand of Christians have reason to bless Dr. Macduff for his works in the past. In the autumn of his life—may it be prolonged for greater good—he has here printed a selection of random, disconnected thoughts from his notes, manuscripts and pulpit addresses. None have before been given to the reading public in any form. They are “ripples of thought,” and we commend them as suggestive, tender, and evangelical; aiding others to illustrate God's truth. Some are of little use, but the most are glowing with the light of a rich Christian experience, and no reader but will be the better for having pressed them on mind and heart. (Robert Carter & Brothers.)

....“HESTER, AND OTHER NEW ENGLAND STORIES.” By Margaret Sidney. There are about a dozen of the best kind of short stories in this book, stories for reading aloud in the home circle or for the quiet reader's keen enjoyment. Each one is a study of that village life which has developed so well among the descendants of the old Puritans, and each has a point and power of its own. The conversations are admirably written, and where description of natural scenery comes in we find a striking power manifest. It is altogether a charming and thoroughly American book. (D. Lothrop & Co.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The New Year's Wide Awake will have a long and readable Christmas story by Sarah O. Jewett, entitled “The Christmas Guest.”

....Whoever intends to buy a book as a holiday present will find the Christmas number of the “BOOK BUYER” or of the “PUBLISHERS' WEEKLY” very helpful. If not on the news stand anywhere, either can be readily obtained by the newsdealer. Each contains not only the advertisements of the chief publishers of New York, Boston and Philadelphia, but also describes the more important books and presents examples of the illustrations of the volumes preferred on account of illustrations. The gift-seeker, by means of either of these pamphlets, has the evident advantage of a survey of the whole field, saves time at the crowded store and can soon extricate himself from its discomfort, or can intelligently send his order by mail.

....Outing begins with a lively picture of the “Mayflower” setting her balloon jib, records Mr. Stevens' experience in bicycling through Persia, continues with Lieut. Bigelow to pursue Geronimo, describes A Day's Fishing in Bermuda, illustrates these papers and others abundantly, and has other valuable and attractive features.

....The Magazine of American History is desirable for Mrs. Lamb's illustrated account of a typical New England Thanksgiving, for a description of Pioneer Life on the Western Reserve, Ohio, for the record of the life and death of the Swamp Angel, and for other reasons. During 1887 the magazine is to print a series of studies by competent writers on the Rise, Progress and Development of Journalism in this Country.

....The New Englander and Yale Review for December has no less than three of its articles and two of the notices of books on questions connected with the labor movements of the day. All are sensible and useful. An article on the origin of religion disposes very satisfactorily of the theories of Compte, Lubbock, Spencer, et alia. A paper by Prof. Barbour furnishes pleasing information on the important topic, Religion in Yale University.

....The Art Journal for January has a very good full-page etching of an agreeable picture by Fildes, representing a doorway group by the side of a Venetian canal. Mr. Hannah begins a series of descriptions of Sir Walter Scott's Country, illustrated by McWhirter. There is a pleasing account of Santa Barbara, the Nice of America, but the cuts representing the work of the German Werner and the Italian Michetti are scarcely distinct enough to show the genius of the artists. Under the title, A Black-Country Heroine, there is a brief narrative of “Sister Dora,” with an illustration of the statue erected in her honor by the people of Walsall.

....The American Journal of Philology (No. 3 of Vol. 7), continues the very elaborate comparison made by Professor Short of the Revision of Matthew's Gospel with the old English translations and the views of modern scholars. The work is a model of patient labor and painstaking accuracy. A valuable paper on the Chronology of Thucydides, found in the MSS. of the late Prof. C. D. Morris, is a pleasing memorial of that able and careful scholar. Prof. Avery contributes an instructive account of the Ao Naga language of Southern Assam, which was reduced to writing by the Rev. E. W. Clark, of the American Baptist Missionary Union. The department of Reviews contains an extended and thorough notice of Leaf's Iliad. The reports of foreign philological periodicals are as usual full and interesting, and the list of recent publications contains what is not found elsewhere in this land.

An Incident of the Past.

"The Word of the Lord Endureth Forever."

A CURIOUS picture, if it may be so called, lies before me. It has hung in my room for many years, valued for itself, and for the sake of the giver, Mr. Frederick Monod, from whose lips I heard its story.

It represents two scraps of scorched paper. The browned and ragged edges are seen on examination to exactly correspond, and are fac similes of the two sides of one fragment, containing a few verses of Scripture.

In the month of August, 1850, a meeting of "Le Synode des Eglises Evangeliques de France," was held at Sainte Foy, (Gironde). To avoid exciting hostility by needless publicity, they assembled in a small town.

As they were sitting in solemn convocation discussing matters pertaining to the religious interests of their beloved country and church, a mob of Roman Catholics burst into the place of assembly, using threatening and violent language, and after annoying them by all means in their power, left, carrying with them two Bibles to the public square, where they tore them to pieces, and with oaths and laughter, watched them burn.

With saddened hearts the "Synode" reassembled the next morning. As one of their number walked with downcast eyes to the appointed place he spied a scorched fragment of paper, and on picking it up read a message from his Lord, so apt, so instructive, so comforting, that he carried it to the "Synode."

On one side these words had escaped the flames. I give a literal translation from the French, which differs slightly from our version.

"—— has raised him from the dead, and has glorified him, that your faith and your hope might be in God.

"22. Having then purified yourselves in obeying the truth, by the Spirit, have a love fraternal, and without hypocrisy; love one another with a pure heart, and with a great affection.

"23. Being regenerated not by a seed corruptible, but by a seed incorruptible, by the Word of God which lives, and which remains eternally."—(1 Peter 1: 21–23.)

On the other side was the following passage:

"19. For this is agreeable to God, that some by a motive of conscience endure evil treatment while suffering unjustly.

"20. But what glory shall it be for you if you were beaten for having done evil you endure it? But if in doing well you are maltreated, and you suffer patiently, it is in this that God takes pleasure.

"It is this also to which you are called, since Christ himself has suffered."—(1 Peter 2: 19–21.)

The Synod listened to the reading with wondering attention and gratitude.

Little did it matter though evil men did rage and seek to destroy God's precious message to our fallen race, they had His own assurance that the "Word of God lives and remains eternally." If they were hated by the enemies of the truth they were bidden to draw closer and hold firmer the bonds of fraternal love; those bonds which link the Church together, and unite it to Him who "was raised from the dead and glorified."

Our God has many ways of comforting those who are cast down. His "works of providence are holy, wise, and powerful." "The wrath of man was made to praise him" in this, as in many other cases.

With new strength and zeal these brethren determined to press forward the evangelization of France.

To increase the means of doing this they determined to send the President of the Synod, Rev. Frederick Monod, to England and the United States, to enlist the sympathies of their brethren in Christ and solicit pecuniary aid.

As one means the mutilated scrap was securely fastened between two pieces of glass, so that both sides could be read. They also caused a large number of fac similes to be struck off, two impressions on a sheet, reproducing both sides of the original fragment. These Dr. Monod carried with him, and many were sold.

Great interest was aroused wherever he went by the fervent addresses of the beloved Pasteur, and large sums contributed to aid the noble, though feeble, Church of France. More than thirty years have passed and Protestantism has become a power in the land, though there is yet much, very much, to be done to win the kingdom of Christ in France.—S. P. W., in The Presbyterian.

The Coachman and His Prayer.

I WAS once riding on the box-seat of a stage coach, when the driver began to swear in a most fearful manner. "Coachman, do you ever pray?" I quietly said. He seemed displeased, but replied: "I sometimes go to church on a Sunday; I suppose I pray then, don't I?" "I am afraid you never pray at all; for no man can swear as you do, and yet keep up the habit of praying to God."

As we rode along he seemed thoughtful. "Coachman, I wish you would pray now," I said. "Why, what a time to pray, sir, when a man is driving a coach!" "Yet, my friend, God will hear you." "What shall I pray for?" he asked in a subdued tone. "Pray these words: 'O Lord, grant me Thy Holy Spirit, for Christ's sake. Amen.'" He hesitated, but in a moment he repeated them; and then, at my request, a second and third time. Soon after I arrived at the end of my journey.

Some months passed, and we met once more. "Ah, sir," said he, with a smile, "the prayer you taught me on that coach-box I believe was answered. I saw myself a lost and ruined sinner; but now I humbly hope, through the blood that cleanseth from all sin, and by the power of the Holy Spirit, I am a converted man."

Are you far from Christ by wicked works? If you are, will you also use the coachman's prayer for the converting grace of the Holy Spirit to rest upon your heart?—Selected.

What One Woman Did.

SEVERAL years ago Miss Beilby, a young Englishwoman who had studied medicine to fit herself for usefulness as a missionary at Lucknow, in India, was sent for by the wife of the native Prince of Punna, who was ill. Punna was a long distance from Lucknow, and the journey was a dangerous one; if Miss Beilby went she would be separated by more than a hundred miles from any white man.

Her friends urged her to refuse. The Englishwoman was young and timid, but she knew her duty; she went, remained two months, and cured the patient. When she was about to return the Ranee sent for her, and begged her to go in person to Queen Victoria with the message that Indian women, not being allowed the attendance of male physicians, died in great numbers every year for want of care. The Ranee brought paper, pen and ink, and, with tears, besought Miss Beilby to write her petition to the Queen to send them women doctors.

"Write it small, Saheba," she begged, "for I shall put it in a locket and hang it about your neck, and you must wear it until you put it in the hands of the great Ranee herself."

Miss Beilby returned to England the next year, obtained an interview with Queen Victoria, and placed the locket in her hands with the message. The Queen was deeply touched, and empowered Lady Dufferin, the wife of the Viceroy of India, to form an association for sending out female medical aid to the women of India.

Many women doctors have been sent out by the association, and Indian women are now being educated as physicians and nurses. An estate of fifty acres, with large buildings, has been given by a native prince as a hospital for Hindoo female patients.

Had the timid missionary refused to undertake the perilous duty to one woman, these great blessings—which are but the beginning of help and hope for all the women of India—probably never would have come to them.

Sow the seed, however small it be, of good deeds. Only God knows what the fruit will be.—Youth's Companion.

A Well-Known Society Lady's Life Saved.

MRS. COLONEL FLEMING, an accomplished lady, well known in Philadelphia, in Western Pennsylvania, and in Washington, has been spending a considerable time in Philadelphia, preparatory to going to Washington, where it is understood she is to have her future home. Graceful in her movements, elegant in form and the very picture of health in her features, Mrs. Fleming would not be taken for one who had suffered a long experience of illness, and who had so completely lost her health that her friends had given up all hope of her recovery.

The writer recently met Mrs. Fleming, and had a conversation with her as to her illness and restoration.

"For many months," said Mrs. Fleming, "during the protracted illness of my husband, which resulted in his death, I was with him night and day, undergoing a very severe strain, both physically and mentally. While he lived I was able to bear up under all this, but when he died then came a reaction, and I was taken with a severe catarrhal fever. This brought me down very low, after awhile I rallied, but did not recover my health. I fell into a state of nervous exhaustion, with neuralgic pains almost beyond endurance. My head was so sensitive that I could not touch it with a comb. My hands were so disabled that I could not bar my own window-shutters. I had difficulty in recognizing my best friends during some of the time while I was at my worst. Day and night I suffered more than I can tell. This was at my home in Franklin, Pa. Finding that the best physicians there were unable to relieve me, I came to Philadelphia to consult physicians who were specialists in nervous diseases. Following their advice I went to the University hospital, where I had a private room and the most skilful medical attendance. But it was in vain. From all this I received no advantage."

"Some years ago I had heard of what was then a new remedy, but was said to do wonderful things in the cure of stubborn and chronic nervous diseases. It was 'Compound Oxygen.' I thought I could do no worse than to try it. Unable to walk even a short distance, I went in a carriage to the office of Drs. Starkey and Palen. On reaching there I was so exhausted that I was unable to state my case to Dr. Starkey. After resting I had a full conversation with him and he gave me encouragement to hope that Compound Oxygen might give me some relief. It was with some apprehension of possible failure that my first inhalation was taken. But as soon as I realized what it was, I was delighted with the soothing and strengthening effect of the Treatment. Dr. Starkey thought that in about three weeks some permanently good result might be expected. Rooms were secured near the office, for I was too weak and nervous to go any great distance, even in a carriage. I took the Office Treatment regularly every day. In about two weeks I experienced a marked improvement, which now daily increased. My exhausted brain began to be itself again, and my body received new vitality. With improvement came hope of entire recovery. For the first time since my husband's death I found relief from the pain and prostration which had borne so heavily on me."

"With changing weather I would sometimes receive a partial setback for a few days. But this did not discourage me. Friends of mine, in Franklin, had been cured of severe and protracted illness, and why should not I? I kept regularly on for months, not as an experiment, for I found that I was receiving solid and practical good from the Treatment."

"Not a particle of any other medicine ut Compound Oxygen did I take. This was doing the work for me, and I determined to give it a fair chance."

"I suppose I need hardly ask you, Mrs. Fleming, if your health is now perfectly restored?"

"I am as you see me. I have neither ache, pain, nor weakness. I sleep well, and my appetite is hearty. I am as active as I ever was, and in as good spirits, and I lay it all to Drs. Starkey and Palen's care of me, and treatment with Compound Oxygen. Without this I think I should have been dead long before this. It is now nearly two years since I began taking the Compound Oxygen. If I should ever be sick again I will again take it; but happily I have no need of it now."

The whole story of Compound Oxygen is pleasantly told in a little brochure of 200 pages, issued by Drs. Starkey and Palen, 1529 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa. This will be mailed freely to all who write, requesting it.

Rheumatism

We doubt if there is, or can be, a specific remedy for rheumatism; but thousands who have suffered its pains have been greatly benefited by Hood's Sarsaparilla. If you have failed to find relief, try this great remedy.

"I was afflicted with rheumatism twenty years. Previous to 1883 I found no relief, but grew worse, and at one time was almost helpless. Hood's Sarsaparilla did me more good than all the other medicine I ever had." H. T. BALCOM, Shirley Village, Mass.

"I had rheumatism three years, and got no relief till I took Hood's Sarsaparilla. It has done great things for me. I recommend it to others." LEWIS BURBANK, Biddeford, Me.

Hood's Sarsaparilla is characterized by three peculiarities: 1st, the combination of remedial agents; 2d, the proportion; 3d, the process of securing the active medicinal qualities. The result is a medicine of unusual strength, effecting cures hitherto unknown. Send for book containing additional evidence.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla tones up my system, purifies my blood, sharpens my appetite, and seems to make me over." J. P. THOMPSON, Register of Deeds, Lowell, Mass.

"Hood's Sarsaparilla beats all others, and is worth its weight in gold." I. BARRINGTON, 130 Bank Street, New York City.

Talking In Their Sleep.

"You think I am dead,"
The apple-tree said,
"Because I have never a leaf to show—
Because I stoop,
And my branches droop,
And the dull gray mosses over me grow!
But I'm all alive in trunk and shoot;
The buds of next May
I fold away
But I pity the withered grass at my root."

"You think I am dead,"
The quick grass said,
"Because I have parted with stem and blade!
But under the ground
I am safe and sound
With the snow's thick blanket over me laid.
I'm all alive, and ready to shoot,
Should the spring of the year
Come dancing here—
But I pity the flower without branch or root."

"You think I am dead,"
A soft voice said,
"Because not a branch or root I own!
I never have died,
But close I hide
In a plumy seed that the wind has sown.
Patient I wait through the long winter hours;
You will see me again—
I shall laugh at you, then,
Out of the eyes of a hundred flowers!"

Edith M. Thomas, in Western Recorder.

The Christian Intelligencer.

For 1887.

OLD COLONY, whose circle of admirers is constantly enlarging, and whose services are sought more and more by newspapers and periodicals, will continue, God willing, to review the events of the times with mingled wit and wisdom, week in and week out, for the readers of THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, during the coming year. Aunt Marjorie's Corner will be the same quiet retreat where Christian women, bent on being and doing good, will counsel and cheer each other. We have not acquired sufficient self-consciousness to claim that the INTELLIGENCER is the best religious paper, but we do claim that the wise, capable, conscientious and devout women of the Church have made the Corner one of the best pages of the kind published anywhere. Cousin Lois expects to gather the children about her and entertain them with profitable stories and readings and puzzle them with riddles.

The Rev. Mr. Van Pelt has translated for us another story from the Dutch, illustrating the life of the Christians of the Netherlands during the Reformation, and will continue to do what has never been done before and ought to have been done long ago, by supplying sketches of the Martyrs of Holland for English readers. Other good stories are in hand for the contributors' page, and papers commended by the Pastors' Association, and other papers dealing with topics of present importance.

The life of the Church will be recorded, the opportunities and work before it will be presented, as completely as possible.

The INTELLIGENCER has no animosity toward the authors of the old errors, dubbed The New Theology, but has no sympathy with their speculations. The sublime truths which all evangelical Christians have cherished for centuries, which have produced a long succession of saintly men and women of whom the world was not worthy and to whom the world is unspeakably indebted, and which have produced the beneficent Christian associations which have sent the light of life into hundreds of thousands of dark places; the truths which have enlightened, strengthened, supported, renewed, incited, comforted and cheered an innumerable multitude of believers, are good enough for us. They have been tried and proved and THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER will hold fast to them and do what it can to commend them.

The Sabbath will be defended, the labor question will be considered, temperance will be advocated, partisan politics will be let alone, and so far as possible the conflicts and triumphs of the kingdom of our Lord on the earth will be related.

Trusting in God and not in man, in the truth as it is in Jesus, animated chiefly with a desire to be faithful to our Lord and Redeemer, we venture into another year.

No Occident.

I WAS over to Elder Smith's ranch several weeks ago. As I was leaving I said to him, "I suppose you will make arrangements so as to attend some of the meetings of the Synod in San Jose?"

"The Synod—let me see—that's not the same as Presbytery, is it?"

"No, it embraces all the Presbyteries in California. There will be more than a hundred ministers and elders in attendance. The meetings will be very interesting. You ought to attend them and to take your folks with you."

"And you say that it's going to meet in San Jose? Why, I haven't heard a word of it."

"But you saw the notice in The Occident, didn't you? It has been published for several weeks."

Elder Smith looked rather embarrassed, and, after a moment's silence, said: "The truth is, Rusticus, we don't take The Occident now."

"Don't take The Occident? How, then, do you know what our church is doing on this coast, and how do you keep in sympathy with it?"

"Well, you see, I have to take a daily paper to know what is going on in the world. My wife and daughters will have Harper's Bazar, for they can't dress decently so as to go to church without it. And John must have the Pacific Rural, to learn all he can about farm and orchard work. And the children want a lot of picture papers to amuse them. You know we can't afford to take everything, so we have stopped The Occident."

"Yes, I see; you must have politics and fashion, and all that is new and fresh in agriculture, and amusement for the little ones, but you can dispense with religion."

"We don't dispense with it. We go to church every Sunday and to Sabbath-school. We have our Bibles and our Lesson papers."

"Yes, and the result is that you know something about the history of the Church in the days of Abraham and Moses and Paul, but you don't know anything about what the Church is doing to-day. The Acts of the Apostles in the New Testament are excellent as far as they go. But the same God is working now through holy men, in all parts of the world. They are organizing churches, and laboring to bring in the millennium. Some of them are enduring trials and persecutions not unlike those endured in Apostolic times. Of the acts of the modern apostles you know nothing, unless you take a religious newspaper.

"You are a Republican, and so you must take a paper that will keep you posted in regard to your party. But you have a higher citizenship. You belong to the kingdom of God. You have interests, duties and hopes, in connection with the Church, that are a hundred fold more important than those connected with the nation. The Bible gives you the principles in regard to this higher sphere in which you live and act: but for the facts you must go to the religious newspaper. The daily papers, large as they are, have no space to spare for the work of the Church. They will give a column to the report of a dog fight, and begrudge a meagre three lines to the report of a revival of religion."

"But The Occident isn't as large as some of the other Church papers, and yet it costs just the same. If I must take a Church paper, why not take one of the big ones from Chicago or Cincinnati, and get more for my money?"

"Because you are a Californian. Your interests and duties, as a Christian, are here. You must sustain California institutions, just because they are struggling to live. You belong to a small church in the country. It costs a few of you a good deal to keep it up. And, after all, you don't get as fine music or as good preaching as you could hear in a city church at less cost. But you stand by a country church because your home is here, your property is here, your duties as well as your interests are here. It is so with this paper. It is ours. It is indispensable to us as an organ of communication, and a bond of union between our scattered churches. We must all stand by it and help to build it up. I know something about those big eastern papers that you refer to. I can remember when they were no larger than The Occident, and had as hard a struggle as it has now. But good people stood by them and labored to extend their circulation because they were needed in what was then our Western missionary field. To the help of such true friends those great papers owe their prosperity. We can make our Occident equal to them in all respects, in a few years, if we do what we can to sustain it. But if we think that we can do without it, or that it can do without us, it will die, just as a tree dies when its roots are cut. I tell you, Brother Smith, when I go into a Presbyterian home on this coast and find no Occident there I feel sad. I don't see how any man out here can keep in full sympathy with the church he belongs to, or can train up his family for membership in it, without the weekly visits of The Occident. It costs only five cents a week, and you spend five times that amount for things that you do not really need."

I hope that Elder Smith will renew his subscription.—Rusticus, in The Occident.

Scientists as Christians.

THE Rev. William Guest, in an article in the London Christian, gives a remarkable and most encouraging review of the progress of Christian sentiment in the British Scientific Association, which recently met at Birmingham, in contrast with its last meeting there in 1865. Then scepticism prevailed, and many members took it for granted that the teachings of revelation were exploded. Sneers at Christian belief were frequent and offensive; Darwinism was rampant. "The claim set up for science was that of infallibility, and a new era was supposed to have dawned, which had bowed God and His commandments out of the universe." At the last meeting Sir William Dawson, the President, was a decided Christian, and in his address took a firm and unmistakable stand as a believer in the Bible. In the Section of Geology, which science, twenty-one years ago, was thought dangerous to faith, leading members were of pronounced religious views, and it was evident the greater the progress of geological researches, the less is the tone of unbelief. In the Section of Anthropology, which was then permeated with boastful scepticism, the President, Sir George Campbell, declared that the Bible teaching as to the origin of man is the only firm ground. The President of the Section of Biology, William Carruthers, F.R.S., is a well-known believer in divine revelation. On the Sabbath a large number of the members met for devotional service, when Sir William Dawson urged scientific men to apply the same intelligence and earnestness to the study of the Scriptures as they do to that of nature. Mr. Guest comes to the hopeful conclusion that, while in 1865 scientific scepticism was in apparent ascendancy, "this year, on the contrary, the ascendant sentiment has been the presence of Christian thought and conviction."—Baptist Weekly.

An Insidious Enemy.

There is possibly no disease that attacks the human system that is more insidious in its approach than Catarrh. Very few appreciate that a slight cold and a heavy, dull feeling in the upper part of the head leads to anything serious, or are disposed to treat for prompt cure. Many a poor victim whose life has been made miserable for years can look back to a time when if he had considered catarrh at all a dangerous disease, or a matter of serious difficulty, could have easily cured it.

Of catarrh it can be truly said that a stitch in time saves nine. Many diseases that are now classed under the general head of "malarial" and "consumptive" are generally preceded by heavy catarrh.

It is the first symptoms of these diseases so harmless in their apparent effects, and yet so serious in their results, that should make the word catarrh a household dread, and its earliest symptoms feared and provided for, as would be the most contagious diseases.

Accompanying the treatment of Rev. T. P. Childs, who has become famous the country over for having twenty years ago established the fact that "catarrh could be cured," and whose treatment is the only now known remedy, is a Cold Air Inhaling Balm, which when used for a cold in the head, bronchitis, clergyman's sore throat, or any disease of the larnyx, is wonderful in its results. Rev. T. P. Childs, of Troy, O., has become so widely known in connection with the catarrh cure, and has cured so many thousands of people, that to suggest catarrhal troubles suggests Rev. T. P. Childs.

The discovery of his cure for Catarrh and diseases of the Throat and Lungs has attracted great attention. Leading men everywhere publicly state that Childs' treatment has cured them or their families of Catarrh or Throat or Lung difficulties—among them clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, bankers and business men. All who have personally investigated the facts are satisfied that Mr. Childs has discovered a certain, positive and permanent cure for these diseases that when properly used never fails even in the most desperate cases. In a thoroughly honorable and characteristic manner he publishes the names and addresses of some he has cured, that any who desire may inquire of the patients themselves what Childs' treatment has done for them.

Many who do not receive our paper would doubtless be very thankful should our readers call the attention of such to the advertisement of Mr. Childs. Catarrh and Consumption are the twin enemies of the race, and any means of relief is a heaven-sent blessing.

ANONYMOUS communications cannot receive attention. A communication signed only by initials must be disregarded. Somewhere on the manuscript the name of the writer should appear. Items of Church news, without the name of a responsible person, are of no value. The name is not desired for publication, simply for the information of this office. Any initials or assumed name may be appended for publication. It is desirable that something of the sort be signed to every manuscript. Even items of Church news should have something added to show that they do not originate in this office. But for everything the name of the writer will be required. This is the only safe rule. Once or twice recently the rule has been suspended with great reluctance. We are extremely unwilling to do so again.

THE CLOSE of one year and beginning of another is to us of the northern hemisphere a natural division of time. The sun has reached its lowest circuit of the sky and begins to mount to a higher latitude. One period of sowing, and reaping, and garnering the results has passed away and the preparations for another period of activity have begun. It is natural to recall the past year, wise to learn something from it, and to apply the lesson to the coming year. No one regrets the good he has done. No one is sorry over any act of love and service to our Lord Jesus Christ, any hour when he yielded to the impulses of the Holy Spirit. No one regrets the hours or days of sincere regard for the Bible, or that he has in any degree ordered his life by the Bible. The hours spent in earnest prayer no one mourns over. On the contrary, men lament that they have not been more faithful to God, have not more habitually looked to Jesus Christ, have not cherished the Holy Spirit in their hearts more constantly. The wise conclusion is to be, God helping us, more godly through the coming year. The safest course in all circumstances is "to be found in the path of duty." The phrase is an old one, embodies the experience of good men and women, and has worn well. It is a good phrase to consider at the beginning of a new season of effort. It is wise, also, while following the path of duty, to trust in God with a simple, undoubting confidence. The papers are telling the story of an old lady in New Hampshire who recently celebrated her eightieth birthday by giving an elaborate supper to her friends, every article being prepared by her own hands. When the company sought the reason for her unusual strength and helpfulness, she said, "I never fret over things I cannot help, never take my work to bed with me, and I oil the many wheels of a busy life by an implicit faith that there is a brain and a heart to this great universe, and that I can trust them both." The story needs no comment.

To do what God gives us to do, as well as we can, trusting in Him, seeking wisdom and strength from Him, and then to leave the results with Him is the way to make 1887 a Happy Year. Such we hope it will be to all who read these lines.

FOR THE WEEK OF PRAYER the Boston Ministers' Meeting has adopted a programme which amounts to praying almost exclusively for the Boston churches—for the power of the Holy Spirit in the members of those churches. That such a limitation of prayer is unwise or un-Christian no one will say after reckoning what would be the result if the members of the Boston churches were filled with the Spirit of God. At other meetings, even at missionary conferences, a disposition has been manifested to pray chiefly for the churches on whom the missions depend. This has seemed to proceed from a spiritual instinct, a general impression that the great need at present is a reviving of life in the churches. It has not been, in some instances at least, the result of a pre-arrangement or an agreement between certain managers to give a certain turn to the meeting, but a spontaneous expression of the need felt and the gift chiefly desired. Such exhibitions of Christian wishes deserve to be thought about. It may be that the main request to be made during the Week of Prayer should be for the churches of the town or city in which we live and for the churches of our land. We are far from being ready to say that such ought not to be the burden of prayer next week, and through succeeding weeks, until the longed-for answer is received. The topics as arranged by the Boston ministers will be found on the twelfth page. Still, we are unwilling to give up altogether, even for one week, the original purpose of the Week of Prayer, which was, To pray for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all flesh.

EUROPE is disquieted with a fear of war in the spring. Germany asks for an addition of forty thousand men to the army; France seeks an equal augmentation of her forces. Even Montenegro calls out thirty-five thousand troops. General preparation may avert hostilities; but nothing lessens the grievous burden of taxes on the people.

THE DEATH of Senator Logan, announced on Monday, startled the nation. Very few had noticed that he was ill, and no one, outside of a very small circle, supposed his illness to be serious. Both of the candidates of the great parties for the Vice-Presidency have passed away, while the Presidential term is only half expired. General Logan dies at about sixty years of age. Many of the leaders in the field and in the councils of the nation during the Civil War have died when but a little beyond three-score years. The time of trial, when they carried heavy responsibilities and endured severe anxieties, consumed vitality rapidly, and the majority of those of them who have passed a few years beyond sixty have been carried to the grave.

General Logan was a brave, conscientious and able man, a leader of men. Hundreds of thousands of men were very strongly attached to him, and mourn for him to-day. He was a decided party man and for that reason was admired and trusted by thousands of intelligent and patriotic citizens. The honesty and purity of his character are unquestioned. For years he had been a member of a Christian church and died trusting in our Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour.

No Mystery.

THERE are many sayings which, at first sight, seem unintelligible and inexplicable to men. Interpret them they cannot consistently with their ordinary modes of thought and rules of judgment. They oppose all current maxims, contradict all established facts that have ever come within the range of their knowledge, do violence to all philosophic theories expounded in their books, and find no counterpart in the common run of human experience. Such sayings are therefore accounted foolishness. The great Apostle understood this truth, and of many of his utterances it is the true key of interpretation. For instance: "The preaching of the cross is to them that perish, foolishness;" also, "We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a stumbling-block, and unto the Greeks, foolishness."

Here are two men living side by side, both doing business in the same street. They prosper; wealth flows into their hands; they each amass a fortune. They say, "It is well." In their families all is health and happiness; the children are well-behaved, intelligent, promising. The future is all bright. These men repeat, "It is well." But anon, the clear sky is overcast; the firmament becomes ink; adversity pours in upon them like a flood, sweeping away their fortunes, dashing out their hopes, blighting all their prospects. What now? Says one, "It is well;" says the other, "Not well; it is ill; why has all this evil befallen me?" And now, with their loss of wealth comes loss of health. A deeper shadow settles down upon their homes. Disease fades out the color from the roseate cheeks of childhood. Mothers grow thin and pale from anxious care and watching, dreading the end that is near—the end that must come. The lights burn low; there is crape on the door; friends speak in whispers and go about the house in silence. Repeated, twice, thrice; afflictions seldom come singly. In both family plats there are fresh made graves. Brother and sister lying side by side; mother and child lying side by side.

What, now, is the response, when to these men, once prosperous, once happy, but now beset by adversity, the question is asked, "Is it well with thee?" One, in the anguish of his uncomforted soul, replies, "It is not well; the billows have gone over my head; my joy is all gone; I am in the depths of despair." The world says, "Yes, that is natural. Your affliction is great; we understand how it is that you are so troubled; we don't wonder at it." And that is about all the comfort the world can give the poor, heart-broken man. The other replies, in sweet composure of mind and serenity of spirit, "It is well. The Lord doeth all things well;" and the prayer ascends, "Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name, Thy will be done." The world pauses, and hears, and wonders, and whispers, "Mystery!"

Mystery? It is no mystery. In the sure light of Revelation all is made clear. The one is a Christian and the other is not; the one is a believer and the other an unbeliever; the one is a natural man and the other a spiritual man. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them because they are spiritually discerned."

To the believer bereavement is not a mystery. By faith he perceives in it the evidence of his heavenly Father's love. According to the Scripture on which he relies, "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." For a child of God to quietly and uncomplainingly submit to divine chastisement and to testify under the rod, "it is well," is not mystery. Such submission and testimony are but proofs of his faith in God and trust in His promises. No matter how severe the tempest; how deep the anguish, contemplating the end, he exclaims, "It is well," trusting, meantime, in the Scripture, "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." Projecting his vision beyond the confines of the temporal into the realm of the spiritual, and having now and then, though dim they may be, forecasts of that kingdom, entrance to which is through much tribulation, and catching by faith's mightiest reach, and the Spirit's brightest illumination, glimpses of its celestial splendor, he repeats, "It is well," meanwhile resting in hope on the assurance, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

That the people of God are not dismayed when they are led into deep waters, or cast into fiery furnaces; that they fear no evil as they go down into the valley of the shadow of death, is no mystery. For they hear the voice of Him in whom they confided in life, and whom they trust in death, who is mightier than many waters, who hath power to divide the sea, and to quench the flame, saying unto them: "Fear not; for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. For I am the Lord thy God, the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour."

This explains what to the thoughtless, the unrighteous, the hopeless, is incomprehensible, the language of acquiescence with which the believer in God receives the grievous appointments of His Providence.

NATHANIEL RIPLEY COBB, of Boston, one of those noble merchants of the earlier days, was generous-hearted and conscientious in the highest degree. In fact he was so benevolent that in November, 1821, he drew up the following remarkable document:

"By the grace of God, I will never be worth more than $50,000. By the grace of God, I will give one-fourth of the net profits of my business to charitable and religious uses. If I am ever worth $20,000 I will give one-half my net profits, and if I am ever worth $30,000 I will give three-fourths, and the whole after my fiftieth thousand. So help me God or give to a more faithful steward and set me aside. N. R. COBB."

November, 1821.

We are glad to see the foregoing appear in many of our contemporaries. The remarkable thing about the circumstance is not that Mr. Cobb made such a resolution, but that he adhered to it with undeviating fidelity through his life, And at his death, some forty years ago, it was found that he had in consequence given a very large sum of money to charitable and religious uses. For years after he obtained fifty thousand dollars, all his net profits went into the Lord's treasury. What an example!

THE MONUMENTS of Egypt and Assyria, the papyri, the Babylonian clay cylinders and tablets, have given or will give their testimony confirming the Old Testament Scriptures. Dr. Crosby's lectures will probably round out what has been said by Dr. Robinson and Professor Lansing. Sir William Dawson will bring the testimony of science in support of Genesis. One thing will remain to be done. The assaults of Kuenen and Wellhausen and of the class of critics to which they belong, on the age and authorship of the books and of parts of books of the Old Testament will be untouched, uncontradicted. Will not some church invite Professor Bissell, of Hartford, or one equally familiar with the more recent attack of German critics, to deliver three or four popular lectures showing just what this assault amounts to, where it is weak, how much and how often it has been dishonest? Such a series, following the lectures of Dr. Crosby, would complete the evidence in behalf of the Old Testament, and would probably establish the faith of many persons now in doubt.

A few months ago, when speaking of evangelists, we said we had more to say at some time in relation to special religious services to bring men to faith in the truth. What we reserved for subsequent ment was the necessity for such lectures as Dr. on and Prof. Lansing have delivered, and such as are yet to come. Confidence has been diminished in the faith of some Christians and many persons, disposed to believe the Word of God, are undecided, in doubt, and are in a waiting position, because of the bold assertions of German and Dutch critics. Lectures such as Principal Dawson is to give, such as have been given in support of the facts of the Old Testament, this city had and still has need of in order to confirm a now hesitating belief. When the testimony in behalf of the Scriptures shall be rounded out, the enthusiastic and energetic work which is the natural expression of a strong faith, may be expected. Such lectures as Prof. Bissell could give would complete the evidence.

A Sonnet.

BY GEORGE W. BUNGAY.

"SAINT CLAUS forgetting none, by none forgot,"
Will in good season come, though like a pall
Afar and near the chilling snows may fall.
Frost, wind and ice, and blustering winds cannot Prevent his tour to cradle and to cot.

Each stocking hanging on the chimney wall
Will hold a prize. Though steep the roof and tall,
Our saint will climb it, with his pack, and "Dot,"
The babe, and all the little ones and old
Will be made glad with gifts their hose shall hold.

Upon the window panes and the white fleece
Is a document in crystal letters writ,
So queer that few will understand that it
Is a life gift of life's continued lease.

OUR RECORD OF THE YEARS.

1886.

THE focus of world-history continues to be the Balkan Provinces, occasioned by the insatiate ambition of Russia, which cannot brook to see its way to Constantinople hedged up. Prince Alexander of Bulgaria, after his brilliant defeat of the Servians and his successful annexation of East Roumelia, became the hero and darling of his subjeets, and at the same time assumed an attitude of still greater independence, if not defiance, toward Russia. Consequently, on the 22d of August, the latter power, by intrigues with the palace guard, succeeded in a sudden overpowering of the Prince, forced him to resign the crown, and hurried him out of the kingdom. There was an immediate and almost universal rising of the people, whose provisional government invited him back. It soon became apparent, however, that he would not be sustained by Germany, or even Austria, and that Bulgaria must be crushed by the overwhelming power of Russia; and accordingly he added a new claim to patriotic renown by abdicating.

The intrigues and bullying attitude of Russia continued, but the Bulgarian Sobranje (or Congress) maintained a resolute position, refusing the Czar's demands for the deposition of the Regency and for the dictation of the ruler to be elected. The selection of a prince is still unsettled, but it has become evident that the other neighboring powers will not consent to anyone who is capable of being a tool of Russia. At the present writing,* a deputation from the Regency is visiting the principal Courts of Europe. The immense warlike preparations of Russia and all the movements of that government, together with the increase of the "war footing" of Germany and other powers, all point to the probability of active hostilities in the spring, when Austria, Hungary, Germany, England and Italy will be arrayed on one side, and Russia and France and perhaps Turkey on the other. In the latter case, we shall probably see the last of the Ottoman rule in Europe, and the final solution of the Eastern Question.

Another centre of political excitement continues to be the Irish Question. Early in the year the Tory Cabinet fell before a vote adverse to its proposition of coercion. Mr. Gladstone then, for the third time, formed a government, conspicuous for the absence of Lord Hartington and Mr. Chamberlain and for the appointment of Mr. John Morley, a radical home ruler, as chief Secretary for Ireland. A Home Rule Bill was introduced on the 8th of April, providing for an Irish provincial parliament, and a week later an Irish Land Purchase Bill, both of these with the cordial concurrence of the followers of Mr. Parnell. The excitement in Parliament on the occasions on which Mr. Gladstone introduced these bills was unparalleled in the recollection of living men, and his speeches were among the greatest oratorical achievements in parliamentary history. He was, however, outvoted, and appealed to the people. The election for a new Parliament resulted in his defeat by the combined forces of the Tories and the "Liberal Unionists" under Hartington and Chamberlain.

Lord Salisbury's cabinet has already been forced to an issue with the Irish tenants, which is acknowledged by its own papers to be a "death-struggle." A "plan of campaign" has been universally adopted of paying over the rents into the hands of trustees in cases where a difference prevails between landlords and tenants, and the government has entered upon an active policy of suppressing this movement by force, as well as by law. Serious dissensions are reported in the cabinet, nearly half of its members, headed by Lord Randolph Churchill, being understood to favor less violent measures. The Irish Question, in any case, seems rapidly approaching another and a supreme crisis.

French history has, as usual, been a succession of changes of the cabinet wishout any special change in its weak and unsuccessful foreign policy, or in any increased unity of counsels at home. France seems to have thrown herself completely into the arms of Russia, and has effectually alienated every other ally in Europe. Her relations to Madagascar are as unsettled as ever, and her aggressions in China have resulted in the wholesale massacre of Christians connected with the Roman Catholic missions in that country. Her principal domestic achievements have been the banishment of the French Princes, and the rise to power and popularity of General Boulanger, the representative of a belligerent policy.

In Germany the iron hand of Bismarck still rules, and dominates Europe, though in the latter case concealed. The anti-socialist policy, side by side with growing amicable relations with the Vatican, is continued. The Prussian Diet has relentlessly pursued its work of expropriating the land of the Poles in Posen, and of colonizing the province with Germans. The deposition of Louis of Bavaria for insanity, and the insanity of his successor and brother Otto, have made their uncle, Prince Luitpold, Regent. Serious socialist and labor troubles have marked the history of Belgium and Holland. Spain has taken measures for freeing speedily the 26,000 remaining slaves in Cuba. An unsuccessful revolution was attempted in September at Madrid. Spain is greatly strengthening its navy, and is evidently intent on becoming once more a naval power in Europe. The Pope has issued a decree, reinstating the Jesuit order in all the privileges which it ever enjoyed, after its having been under disabilities for more than a hundred years.

China is about to be extensively opened to railroads. Japan proceeds rapidly in her career of civilizing and Christianization. Mexico seems at last to be responding to the effect of her railroads in the stimulation of commerce and other industries. Thanks to the wisdom and patriotism of President Diaz, the constant attempts to bring that country into collision with our own have been entire failures. Burman has been finally annexed to the British Empire. The Congo Free State has been formally created by the Powers of Europe. Serious troubles are still experienced among the African tribes, and Mr. Stanley has been hastily summoned from this country to quell a revolt in East Africa.

The principal events in our own country are the rise of the Labor party and the rapid increase of the Prohibition party, the gigantic labor strikes on the Southwestern railways and in Chicago, Milwaukee, New York, Brooklyn and elsewhere, and the murderous anarchist demonstration in Chicago. In almost every case the movements have been unsuccessful, and the labor organizations are turning their weapons against each other. Seven anarchists in Chicago are under sentence of death, and three leading ones in New York are in prison. The workingmen have evidently had their eyes opened to the unwise and unprincipled character of their leaders, and are also disposed to shift the battle to the field of politics. Several hundred thousand men have been idle for periods from a week to three months in consequence of disputes with employers. The prompt action of the courts and the uprising of public sentiment have effectually disposed of the boycott as a weapon of industrial warfare. The utter failure of the labor candidate for Mayor of Boston shows that the large vote of Mr. George in New York was an exceptional case, and due to his personal prestige rather than to his socialistic principles or to the real strength of the new party

* This record closes December 22d.

The progress of Civil Service Reform has been on the whole gratifying, but its varying fortunes lead us to believe what Attorney-General McVeigh told the writer: "Depend upon it, Civil Service Reform will not be a fait accompli till we have an administration elected specificially on that issue, independently of the old parties."

Congress has accomplished very few things of importance in legislation. It has passed acts regulating the succession in case of the deaths or disability of both President and Vice-President, also an act regulating the counting of electoral votes. A tax has been imposed on oleomargarine, the navy is to be strengthened, the pension roll has been greatly enlarged, a Congressional Library is to be built, and Gen. Fitz-John Porter has been reinstated. There seems at present no likelihood of action one way or the other on silver coinage, or on the tariff.

The fisheries disputes with our Canadian neighbors are still unsettled. That province continues to be the refuge of our criminals, but an extradition treaty has been made with Japan. A great advance in our Indian policy has been effected by the bill allotting lands to the Indians in severalty, which lays the axe at the tribal organization, and must speedily introduce the red man into citizenship. The local sensation of the year has been the exposure of the Aldermen of 1884 for taking bribes in support of the Broadway Railroad, the indictment of all the survivors except two, the flight of several to Canada and Europe, the conviction of two and the prospective trial of several more, together with the bribe-givers. The progress of the Southern States in railroad communication and industrial development is increasingly remarkable. The fall elections left the two great parties in about the same relative position, as to their control of the Houses of Congress and the State governments.

On October 28th the Bartholdi Statue was dedicated in N. Y. harbor, in presence of distinguished representatives of France and America. The international races between the English yacht "Galatea" and the American "Mayflower" in September resulted in the success of the latter, and the retention of the "America's Cup" by this country. On the 30th of November, and again the 15th of December the excitement on the N. Y. Stock Exchange was such that the dealings exceeded any previous day in its history. In November, Harvard College observed with imposing exercises its 250th anniversary. It has since received a legacy of over half a million dollars from a citizen of Quincy, Mass. Heidelberg University celebrated its quincentenary, this year.

More than the usual number of terrible catastrophes have occurred by land and sea in all parts of the world, in the way of fires, storms, shipwrecks, railroad accidents, floods, gales, mine explosions, volcanic eruptions, and cholera. An earthquake on August 28th in Greece killed 600 persons and destroyed several towns. On August 31st, the great earthquake at Charleston occurred, whereby 61 were killed, and the city almost wrecked. Over $800,000 were collected in other parts of the country for the relief of its citizens. An extraordinary number of suicides have occurred, and a number of persons have been so foolhardy as to leap from the Brooklyn Bridge, set themselves afloat in the rapids of Niagara, and endure protracted fasts, in one case as long as fifty days.

The most notable ecclesiastical events have been the meeting of the American Board in connection with the Andover theological trouble; the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, with its action on a change of name and its overtures for unity among the denominations; the removal of Prof. Woodrow from his theological chair by the Southern Presbyterians; and two or three sad cases of embezzlement by trusted officials of religious Boards. The epidemic of defalcation, throughout the land, does not abate. On the other hand, the year has been marked by many noble gifts to science and religion, and by myriads of noble lives and holy deaths of the followers of Christ. The martyrdom of Bishop Hannington in Africa will place his name beside those of Bishop Patteson and Dr. Livingstone. Good progress has been made in missionary work at home and abroad, but still "the harvest is great and the laborers are few."

Practical science has made triumphant progress in many directions, notably in the substitution of natural gas for coal in the lighting of whole cities and the working of great manufactories at an immense saving of expense and labor. Business is now largely transacted between New York and Philadelphia by telephone. The art sensations of the year have been the exhibition and sale of the Morgan collection, and Munkacsy's picture of "Christ before Pilate." Valuable archæological and art discoveries have been made by the Egyptian Exploration Fund, the Wolfe expedition to Babylonia, and at Athens and Rome. I do not think of any epoch-making books published within the year, but periodical literature has been enriched by the New Princeton Review, the Forum, Scribner's Magazine, and the Historical Review (English).

There are now nearly 350,000 miles of railway in the world. The population of the United States has gone beyond 60 millions. The consumption of beer in our country is an average of about eleven gallons for every man, woman and child; of whiskey, 1.19 gallons; of tobacco 3.22 pounds; total cost of the three to the people of this country $1,189,000,000.

F. N. ZABRISKIE.

PRINCETON, N. J., December 23d, 1886.

Pilgrims, Immigrants and Puritans.

JOHN R. PAXTON, D.D., of this city, spoke substantially as follows at the New England dinner in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Tuesday evening, December 21st:

It was not the rebellion of the belly against short rations, but the revolt of the soul against tribunals which coerced conscience that settled New England. In our time, people emigrate because they are hungry and want bread. It was to better their fortunes that brought Germans and Irish to our shores. They wept when they sailed away from Fatherland or Erin. They come unwillingly, but hunger has no option. They come for bread. But the Pilgrim fathers and William Penn, of my State, came to our land to clothe their souls with righteousness, and not to fill their stomachs with bread. There is a vast difference between a new country settled by empty stomachs and one settled by hungry souls and consciences determined to be free. If the cabin of the "Mayflower" had been filled with a crowd of hungry peasants, fleeing starvation and thinking only of bread, then the Declaration of Independence would not have been signed and Bunker Hill would not have been fought. People who emigrate on their bellies never found great states. M. Taine says: "A society cannot be founded only on the pursuit of pleasure and power; a society can only be founded on the respect for liberty and justice." I say, on God and conscience. The kingdom of Israel, which governs religion and morality was created by men, who left bread and plenty and ease to keep company with God and to endure hardships in a strange land. The French revolution was sprung by hunger driven to desperation. But when it had glutted its hate and was filled with bread and flushed with wine it ended in Bonaparte instead of Bourbon. The English revolution was backed on God and fought for liberty and justice, and it incorporated its victory in the English constitution and its good works still follow it in mother country and our own land. I say, then, that people, who want more bread emigrate in our day. Who ever heard of an English nobleman coming to us except for a rich wife to go back with American money to spend on London follies. But the pilgrim fathers were not an unworked lot of tinkers and peasants driven by want and armed with the fanaticism of superstition. They were a well-bred company. Brewster's Manse House at Scrooby was a gentleman's residence. In the cabin of the "Mayflower" were Oxford graduates and men who knew the humanities as well as Hebrew psalms and fasts. Gentlemen, it was conscience and God and a lofty ideal of human nature filled the sails of the "Mayflower," not poverty, superstition and ignorance.

Now the Pilgrim father who landed in 1620 was a man of conviction, plus charity, toleration, concession on equal terms. The Pilgrim had joints in his spine—he could bow. The Puritan who came in 1630 was a man of conviction, minus charity, toleration and concession. His spine was unjointed; he could not bow, not even to God. I reverence and love the Pilgrims; I admire and esteem the Puritans. The Pilgrim announced liberty to worship God after his own conscience, but he conceded the same right to others. Strict with himself in conforming conscience to his rigid creed, yet he was gentle and tolerant and offered asylum to Roger Williams. The Puritan was a sort of Procrustes. He had his little narrow iron bed. Everyone must lie in it and fit it to a hair. If one were too long, they cut off his legs or head, as the case might be. If one were too short, they lengthened him in various ways—by the stocks, or by the expansive power of heat, in a pond, or by the elongating virtue of a rope with a heavy weight suspended on it from a gibbet. Still I admire the Puritans, because they were just as ready to suffer death for their creed as to inflict it. Of course they were narrow, but, so says Lowell, in the mood of righteousness, narrow. Certainly they had but one idea, but it was an idea "born of the spirit, not of the flesh;" an idea of the stuff St. Paul was made of, which turned the world upside down, overthrew the unclean gods of paganism, broke the forces, and hurled the eagles of thirty legions in the dust and dragged Cæsar from his throne.

Mr. President and gentlemen, all the epochs in human history have been created by men who were narrow but intense and undoubting in the advocacy of their course. An age of wide and varied culture has never been an age of heroism and martyrdom. Yes, I admire a Puritan at long range, when far enough away from him to differ from him safely, without feeling the weight of his Sinaitic hand or the oppression of his iron creed. I thank God I was not living with keen senses and a jovial soul in Salem Town in 1672, for it would have gone ill with me, because the Rev. Samuel Parris, of unenviable memory, would have hanged me by the neck till I was dead, to the greater glory of God.

Mr. President and gentlemen, the Pilgrim fathers and the Puritans were alike in this—that they insisted on their right to stand on their own feet, see with their own eyes, and breathe, not through a king's lungs, or a pope's lungs, or a parliament's lungs, but through their own lungs. In maintenance of this right, they came to our wilderness shores, and laid broad and deep the corner-stone of our Republican institutions. A pilgrim respected himself as well as reverenced God. He had an independent mind. He was accented on the individual, not on a court, or party, or church. He believed in the worth of a human soul, in the dignity of a man, in the personal right to clear a space for himself in this world and go to heaven by his own road, unhindered by king or prelate or presbytery. Lowell hit off a Puritan to a hair, disclosed his secret and painted his portrait in two lines: "John P. Robinson. He said they didn t know everything down in Judea." That's a "Mayflower" pilgrim, that's a Yankee to-day—the independent mind, the right to find a way or make one for himself, to breathe through his own lungs, to do his own thinking, his own repeating. That kind of a man was Elder Brewster and the first Winslow. That kind of a man was Emerson and Garrison. Nothing if not a protestor. It is in the blood, and wisely do they still call their churches Independent or Congregational. For the son as well as the sire of New England is a good driver, but balky in harness, hard to drive and never takes kindly to blinds or bit and reins.

Nevertheless, on the New England idea—namely, the right to stand on one's own feet, the sovereignty of the individual—was this republic founded, and on that idea must it continue to stand if it is to endure. For the idea that a man is not a power to protect a king, or hedge a bishop, or to be sacrificed for a queen or castle, is at the bottom of all our liberties, all our rights. It is the old Puritan idea; and this is your legacy from your sires and has made your little New England great, dominant, foremost in shaping the destiny of this country, in fostering institutions of learning, in advocating rights, in redressing wrongs, and in furnishing this dear land with successive generations of statesmen, philosophers, poets, historians, reformers, scholars, who have marched in the van of all our progress, and who have been and still are firm in loyalty to the republic and foremost in enriching our literature and adorning our country with their works of genius and patriotism. Great and wonderful men were your aucestors. They believed that a little distinct American walked around under their steeple crown hats—God made—God understood—to God alone responsible, and the priceless legacy they left you is individual rights, personal accountability, self-respect, the approbation of one's own conscience, constancy to truth as you understood it, and loyalty to the best light you have—as you see it. That is the legacy of Plymouth Rock—but God grant that the billows of passion, the strifes of parties, the conflicts of classes, the despair of hunger or the rage of atheism or the greed of corporate power never submerge Plymouth Rock. God grant that our degenerate hands should never throw away—like the base Judean—the two pearls richer than all the gifts of fortune, than all the prizes of life—an unfettered conscience and a free body—a mind imbued with reverence toward God and a hand open and friendly to all charity, to all truth, to all justice, but a hand clenched and uplifted to strike all enemies of the republic, all foes of the liberties, conscience and rights of man.

Our Church.

We are thankful for items of Church News compactly stated; or for marked copies or clippings from local exchanges, which we would not otherwise see. To insure publication in next number, they must reach us by noon on Monday. A condensation of items is unavoidable.

....THE REFORMED CHURCHES along the coast of New Jersey have recently been without pastors, but are now, with one exception, fully equipped.

The Church at the Highlands, since the ordination and installation of the Rev. Henry Boggis on October the 19th, has taken a fresh start. A movement, having in view the erection of a church near the hotels, has been inaugurated, and, receiving the hearty approval of the Classis, is meeting with much encouragement.

The Grand Avenue Church of Asbury Park is also much encouraged. The Rev. D. Chas. Preyer, formerly of Newark, was installed pastor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 14th. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Theo. W. Wells, of Marlboro; the charges were delivered by the Rev. [illegible]t's Neck. There is an effort being made to build a parsonage next to the church on Sewel avenue. The church owns the land, and could save expense by erecting a parsonage.

The First Church of Long Branch is still pastorless. The Classis, at its recent session, Dec. 7th, refused, because of technical irregularities, to approve the call made by the church last April upon the Rev. Edward Cornet. Mr. Cornet was received from the Presbytery of Hastings, Kansas, as a member of Classis, and is supplying the pulpit of the church.

....THE CLASSIS OF PASSAIC met in special session, Dec. 21st, in the lecture-room of the First Church of Totowa.

A statement was made of the origin, present condition and future prospects of Riverside Chapel, and of its interesting, liberal and well-conducted Sunday-school, by the Rev. J. L. Danner, to whose earnest and persevering labors, in connection with the co-operation of the Consistory of the church of which he is pastor, must be attributed the honor of what, thus far, has been accomplished.

A petition was presented containing the names of fourteen persons, requesting the Classis to organize them into a church, and also a paper, signed by eighteen other persons, pledging financial support to such a church when organized.

These matters being fully considered, and in connection with the rapid growth of that part of the city of Paterson, a committee, consisting of Revs. J. C. Cruikshank, H. W. Teller, J. L. Danner, and the Elders N. H. De Motte and J. G. Hopper, was appointed to organize the petitioners into a church.

A call from the Reformed Church of Fairfield upon the Rev. James Bolton, of West Farms, was presented and approved. S. C.

....THE PASTORS' ASSOCIATION on Monday morning listened to a most interesting paper by the Rev. J. W. Warnshuis upon "The Growth of Our Church in the West." The paper next Monday will be read by the Rev. C. Brett on "The Work of the Holy Spirit." Prompt attendance at the meeting of next Monday is urged upon the brethren, as the question of change in the location of the meeting will be considered at 10 o'clock. W. H. F., Sec.

....WALDEN, N. Y.—Another improvement has just been completed in the Reformed Church. An addition of twenty-five feet has been made to the main building, and the organ and choir have been placed behind the pulpit instead of at the side, as heretofore. The music of the church, under the direction of Prof. Apelles as organist and musical director, with a chorus choir of a dozen or more singers, is a special feature of the services. The frescoing of the addition was done by D'Orsay, of New York city, to correspond with the fresco of the main audience room, done by the same artist some years ago. This work being completed with the old year, we enter upon the new year with fresh courage; expecting the windows of heaven to be opened, and rich spiritual blessings to be poured upon us, in answer to the earnest prayers of the people of God in this place. M. V. S.

....WESTERN ITEMS.—Rev. A. Wormser, of Cedar Grove, Wis., has again been asked to consider a call from the Holland Reformed Church of New York city... Last week a Reformed church was organized at Hospers, Sioux Co., Iowa. This makes nine churches in the Holland colony of Sioux Co., and, counting the one at Le Mars, makes ten churches in the northwest of Iowa....Rev. J. F. Zwemer has been appointed Corresponding Secretary of the Northwestern Classical Academy....Rev. L. Dykstra has left North Orange, Iowa, for his new charge at Albany, N. Y.

....THE CLASSIS OF NEW BRUNSWICK adopted the following minute:

Whereas, The Suydam Street Reformed Church of New Brunswick, of which Rev. Dr. Campbell is pastor, and which gives promise of large usefulness in the part of the city where it is located, is yet about $8,500 in debt; and

Whereas, It is very desirable for its greatest usefulness that this debt be liquidated as quickly as possible; therefore,

Resolved, That the several churches of the Classis of New Brunswick be requested to contribute in such way as they may deem proper for the extinction of this debt. S. C.

OCTOBER 19th, 1886.

....PERSONAL.—It is reported that the Rev. John Steele, D.D., of East Greenbush, N. Y., was stricken with paralysis about a fortnight ago and has since remained in a semi-conscious condition.

When Dr. Joachim Elmendorf removed last summer from Poughkeepsie to assume the pastorate of the Church of Harlem in this city, nearly all the pastors of Poughkeepsie were away on vacations. At their first meeting in the fall a committee was appointed to prepare a testimonial of their regard for Dr. Elmendorf. The committee reported the following, which was heartily adopted:

The ministers and pastors of Poughkeepsie, New York, through their committee duly appointed, do hereby and herein, express their high appreciation of the gentlemanly, scholarly, ministerial and Christian character of their late honored and beloved associate, the Rev. Joachim Elmendorf, D.D. We have found him faithful, earnest and fraternal in all our relationships, and a most acceptable laborer in the service of our common Lord, intent on every good work. We part with him with regret, commending him to the God of all grace, and shall rejoice in all his successes and sympathize with him in all his sorrows.

The Rev. E. G. Ackerman has accepted a call from the Church of Woodstock, N. Y., and has begun pastoral work there.

The Rev. A. V. V. Raymond, of Plainfield, N. J., has received a unanimous call from the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Albany, N. Y.

Judge Theodore Miller, of Hudson, N. Y., retires from the bench of the Court of Appeals of this State on the last day of this month, having reached the limit of seventy years of age, established in the Constitution as the boundary of judicial service. The Albany Argus expresses the opinion of many citizens when it says, "There is a universal sentiment of regret felt throughout the State, not only by the bar, but by the public generally, that the people and his associates upon the bench will no longer have the benefit of Judge Miller's great intellect and ripened judgment in solving the perplexing problems continually presented to the court of last resort for solution. Mingled with this feeling of regret is one of grateful appreciation of his faithful, conscientious and invaluable judicial work, extending over a quarter of a century, without any intermission.

"During this judicial service Judge Miller has had occasion to consider and write upon almost every subject embraced within the wide range of jurisprudence, and his peculiarly judicial cast of mind, deep research and clear mode of expression has enabled him to throw light upon them all. His opinions, particularly upon the subjects of the law governing municipal corporations and of criminal law, also as to the construction of wills, will always be the recognized and leading authorities controlling future litigation. Judge Miller, although often solicited, has steadfastly refused to be a candidate for or to accept any office outside of the line of his profession. But within it he has cheerfully responded to all calls upon him, and this at a very great pecuniary sacrifice, as there has been no time within the twenty-five years of his work upon the bench when he could not have earned a sum more than double the salary paid, by less severe labor in the ranks of his profession."

The address of Dr. Jacob Chamberlain on "The Lord's War Waxes Hot," before the Missionary Conference in October, has been translated into Dutch by Mr. H. P. Oggel, of the Northwestern Classical Academy, for the Volksvriend.

The Western churches which the Rev. Wm. I. Chamberlain is visiting in behalf of the Board of Foreign Missions, report constantly the efficiency of his addresses.

Mr. James Hageman, who died last Friday at Roysfield, N. J., in his 79th year, was one of the oldest members of the Second Church of Somerville, N. J., and the father of the Rev. A. J. Hageman, pastor of the Church of Hagaman's Mills, N. Y. Mr. Hagemen's father was one of the original subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, continued to take it during his life, and the subscription was continued by the son to the day of his death.

....A GOOD WORD.—A subscriber in Colorado writes:

"Please find enclosed $2.65 in payment for my paper for the coming year.

"I thank our common Lord and Saviour for THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER, and pray for the continuance of His blessing upon the labors of you, His servants, in getting it up and sending it forth.

"Give my special thanks to Mr. Van Deventer for the part he takes in teaching a Bible class at the foot of the Rocky Mountains."

....A SERMON ON PROHIBITION, preached in 1884, has recently been printed by the Rev. Edward J. Runk. The offering of strange fire before the Lord by Nadad and Abihu, after indulging in wine or strong drink, and resulting in their being consumed by fire from the offended Lord, is made the basis of a series of vigorous sentences. One strong point of the discourse is that social evils have heretofore been removed by prohibition. The sermon can be obtained of the Board of Publication.

The Rev. Joseph H. Kershow.

THE Rev. Joseph H. Kershow died at Centreville, Mich., on Monday, December 20th, after a brief illness. He was about 60 years old. He was born at Harlingen, N. J., graduated from Rutgers College in 1850, and from the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick in 1853, and at once engaged in the missionary work of the Church in the West. His first charge consisted of the churches of Ridgeway and Macon, Mich., where he remained for two years, then served as pastor at Centreville, Mich., for ten years, building up the church there and leaving it much stronger than he found it. In 1865 he was appointed to the charge of the church at Eden, Wis., where he remained two years, and returned to the East, serving successively the churches of New Salem, Gallupville and Sharon, N. Y., during the following ten years.

Mr. Kershow was a man of great purity and sincerity of character. He was diffident, but conscientious in the performance of duty. The interests of our Church in the West were languishing when he became a pastor at Macon, Mich., thirty-three years ago. Although the discouragements were great and apparently endless, he held his position with firm courage and for some years maintained that which seemed to be ready to perish, until the crisis had passed. Those who were witnesses of his course at that time remember him as conscientiously devoted to his work and faithful to the trust committed to him. Many of the sermons which he preached during those years made a permanent impression. To a man of his native modesty, so desirous to do what he had to do quietly and without publicity, it was a trial to be compelled to stand in the front and to lead, when he preferred to follow. But what God gave him to do he did carefully, faithfully and with small regard for personal consequences.

For some years Mr. Kershow has been somewhat an invalid.

Graham Lectures.

SIR J. WM. DAWSON, LL.D., F.R.S., C.M.G., F.G.S., M.A., Principal of McGill College, Montreal, and President of the British Association (for the advancement of Science), has been engaged by the Brooklyn Institute to deliver two lectures at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on the first two Sunday evenings in January. The subject of these lectures will be "The Development of the Divine Plan in the Physical History of the Earth and its Preparation for Man." Dr. Dawson is one of the ablest of living geologists, and his lectures are sure to be of the highest order and abreast with the latest scientific certainties. It is well known that he is not a believer in evolution nor in sympathy with the agnostics. These lectures are supported by an endowment in the will of the late Augustus Graham, which provides for free lectures to be delivered on Sunday evenings during the winter months on the Power, Wisdom and Goodness of God as Manifested in His Works. As these lectures are entirely new, they will be especially interesting to students of natural science; and Dr. Dawson being a fine speaker and a thorough master of his theme, the opportunity is one which no intelligent person ought to miss.

The Church of the Pilgrims and other churches in Brooklyn will be closed on the evenings of these lectures. The Rev. Dr. Storrs will read the Scriptures and offer prayer at the beginning of the course. The lectures are free, and cards of admission can be procured at the rooms of the Brooklyn Institute, the Historical Society, and the Mercantile Library.

Domestic Economy for Japanese Ladies.

IN a recent article, with reference to Japanese social problems, we dwelt upon a difficulty which opposes the introduction of foreign customs into the households of this nation: namely, the fact that among the inmates of the house the ladies, upon whom naturally devolves the management of domestic affairs, are generally least familiar with the details of régime which it is proposed to adopt. Their husbands and brothers, by travelling abroad, by frequenting foreign circles, and by their wider education, may have some knowledge of such matters. But to the ladies everything is strange, and the proposed reform consequently condemns them to stand aside, temporarily at all events, from a sphere which they have been accustomed to consider essentially their own. Since writing on this subject, we have had an opportunity of obtaining information with regard to the Ladies' College (Kôtô Jogakko) in the Imperial University, and we find, with great satisfaction, that a scheme has been there evolved, and is now on the eve of practical inception, which will materially contribute to remove the difficulty in question. The Ladies' College is located in the buildings of the former Gymnastic Institute, outside Hitotsubashi. Originally a branch of the Female Normal School, it was erected this year into an independent college, and placed under the charge of Mr. K. Mitsukuri, one of the most distinguished Professors of the University. Although it has only been a few months in existence, the college is already attended by about 130 pupils, drawn almost entirely from the upper middle classes. We shall not dwell upon the curriculum further than to say that English is made one of the principal studies, and that instruction is given in Japanese, elementary mathematics, physiology and hygiene, chemistry, physics, botany, music, and drawing. The feature which interests specially is an arrangement, suggested by Mr. Mitsukuri, and approved by the Education Department, for imparting instruction in household economy. The pupils being all ladies of good family, it is taken for granted that they can learn at their own homes all that they require to know of housekeeping in Japanese style. Attention is therefore to be chiefly directed to teaching housekeeping in foreign style. In pursuance of this object, it is proposed to erect within the college grounds a house constructed after the model of an English or American middle-class family residence. In this dwelling some foreign ladies are to be invited to live and to keep house as nearly as possible after the methods they would pursue in their own country. There will thus be established an institution bearing the closest attainable resemblance to an English or American home. The pupils of the college will have an opportunity not only of learning cooking, sewing, and housekeeping in the most practical manner, but also of observing exactly how such a home is ordered, and even of acquiring some insight into the family life of people in the West. A few pupils will probably be admitted as boarders, but their number is not on any account to be so large as to disturb the family character of the institution. When they are sufficiently advanced, the idea is that they should give entertainments—all the details of which would be superintended by themselves,—to foreign and Japanese ladies and gentlemen. By these means the usages of society will become familiar. We learn that an appropriation has already been made by the Educational Department for the building, and that the plans are now in process of preparation. The selection of foreign ladies to preside over the "home" has, of course, been a task of some difficulty. His Excellency the Minister of State for Education is understood to have interested himself personally in this part of the scheme, and after much deliberation and many enquiries, the post has been offered to, and accepted by, the Misses Prince, of Maine, who are said to have had much experience in teaching domestic economy. The experiment is therefore in a fair way to be tried, and that it will be attended by successful results we entertain no manner of doubt.—Japan Daily Mail, Nov. 29th.

....The Montefiore Fair held in this city by the Israelites for ten nights, closing with the 18th, yielded in all about $175,000, from which is to be deducted about $15,000 expenses. The Hebrews of this city sustain their charities very generously.

The General Outlook.

....Mededeelingen of the Netherlandish Missionary Society.—This is the fourth quarterly issue of the thirtieth year. It opens with an interesting account of some of the traditions and riddles of the Alfoers, which is followed by a full tabular statement of the laborers and results in Minahassa, the largest station of the Society. Mention is made of the loss of adherents who went over to Rome, most of them induced by marriage ties. The propagandism of Romanism in missionary fields occupied by Protestants is disagreeable enough when there are so many other vacant regions which they might occupy. The next article treats of the general missionary work in the world at large, and shows full acquaintance with the various monographs on this subject issued in different countries. It quotes the saying of a British general officer at one of the London conferences, that one missionary does more for the peace of the world and its rectitude than a regiment of soldiers. The last article is a translation of Dr. George Turner's account of twenty-five years' labor on the islands of Samoa.

....Says the New York Herald: "The foes from whom 'the organized drunkard manufacturers in the United States' have the most to fear are educated women." Commenting on this the Newcastle Daily Leader of England remarks: "Our educated women are hardly heard of as yet in opposition to the drink interest in England, whereas in America over one hundred and twenty thousand of the brightest women are organized, actively associated, and publicly and mutually pledged against the trade."

....The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Sioux City, Iowa, propose to erect a memorial building to the memory of the Rev. George C. Haddock, who was assassinated in that city last August while advocating the temperance cause. A site has already been purchased.

....A granite shaft has been erected in Greenwood Cemetery to the memory of Pastor Hedstrom, the founder of Swedish Methodism. There are now 274 Methodist Swedish, Norwegian and Danish churches in this country and Europe, with 31,584 members and church property valued at $661,000.

....Mr. Gladstone is reported as saying that there are now in the universities ten times as many infidels and atheists as when he was a student; but that there are, on the other hand, twenty times as many devout and earnest seekers after truth. This seems to us a judicious presentation of the case as regards Christianity in the present day.

Its headquarters are in the city of Mexico, where the work is under the wise and vigorous oversight of Rev. Dr. J. Milton Greene. Besides the admirable girl's school, they have in the capital two churches and five preaching-places.

....In his "Life of Jesus," Renan, the French sceptical critic, was pleased to say that "whatever may be the transformations of dogma, Jesus will remain in religion the creator of its pure sentiment; the Sermon on the Mount will never be surpassed." Years have passed since the self sufficient Frenchman made this patronizing bow to Christ and his utterances of pure morality, and Renan appears again, in this year of our Lord, with one of the vilest dramas which can be found in the French language. It has been put on the stage in Paris, and though Parisians are far from being Puritanical, the grossness of some of the situations has repelled even Paris. There is a bit of hypocrisy here which is loathsome. Look at the pictures—Renan acknowledging that "Jesus remains to humanity an inexhaustible source of moral regeneration," and then doing his utmost in his chosen sphere to degrade and defile his own generation.—The Presbyterian.

....Of the various phases of the celebrated "Woodrow case" all seem to have disappeared except the appeal of Dr. Woodrow from the decision of the Board of Directors to the General Assembly to meet next May. This appeal will bring the whole matter to the highest court of the Church for review and final decision. The present results of the whole contest may be summarily comprehended in the statement that Dr. Woodrow has now no professorship in the Seminary at Columbia and the Seminary at Columbia no students. The process of evolution has been completed and is disastrous.

....The Lutheran Observer gives the following interesting facts: After Heidelberg, the German universities rank in point of age as follows: Wurzburg, founded in 1403; Leipzig 1409, Rostock 1419, Greifswald 1456, Freiburg 1457, Tubingen 1477, Halle (formerly Wittenberg) 1502, Breslau (formerly Frankfurt) 1506, Marburg 1527, Konigsberg 1544, Jena 1557, Giessen 1607, Kiel 1665, Gottingen 1737, Erlangen 1743, Berlin 1809, Bonn 1818, and Munich 1826. The University of Prague, in Bohemia, is older even than that of Heidelberg, having been founded in 1348. The University of Basel, in Switzerland, was founded in 1460.

Halle has 616 theological students; Berlin, 606; Greifswald, 357; Gottingen, 247; Konigsberg, 244; Marburg, 193; Breslau, 181; Bonn, 133; and Kiel, 61. These are all Prussian universities.

....The Hebrew Free School Association of this city held its annual meeting on Sunday, Dec. 19th. The reports were that the pupils in the Hebrew and religious classes number 2,039, in the industrial schools 501, in the kindergarten 118, the normal 30. The society owns two buildings, 624 Fifth street, purchased for $15,000; 206 East Broadway and 195 Division street, which cost $34,000. There were received last year from membership dues, $8,543.25; legacies and memorial gifts, $4,250; from a fair, $22,227.28; from the Young Ladies' Charitable Aid Society, $1,801.29; rent, $928.19. The society has an invested fund of about $15,000. There are 1,190 members.

....The 200th anniversary of King's Chapel, Boston, was most fittingly observed on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 15th, with addresses by Governor Robinson, President Eliot of Harvard, Drs. Phillips Brooks, G. E. Ellis, James Freeman Clarke and others. A poem and hymn by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes were additional features of interest. The building itself is one of the most unique in the city, and was finely decorated with portraits of the Royal Governors, coats-of-arms, and flags associated with the early history of the country. The square, old-fashioned pews, upholstered in crimson, still retain their original form, and the one reserved for the use of the Governor, in early days, is still marked by canopies upheld by slender pillars. In front of the pulpit was the royal escutcheon which, until the Revolution, was placed over the door of the Province House, and the communion plate, exhibited within the chancel, was the gift of three kings. The wealth of historical associations which cluster around this edifice was admirably brought out in all the exercises.—The Congregationalist.

At the Throne of Grace.

BY THE REV. NORMAN PLASS.

RICH the moments, sweet their story,
Which we spend before the throne;
There we see the Father's glory,
There He makes His beauties known.

There our blessed Saviour meets us,
Our petitions to present;
There the Holy Spirit greets us,
With His gracious influence sent.

There our fears are all supplanted,
And our hearts are set aglow;
There to us is newly granted
Strength for labor here below.

ere our trust in God is strengthened,
d our hopes grow clear and bright;
ere the arm of God is lengthened,
Help to give us in His might.

Precious moments, rich in blessing,
e the throne;
confessing,
his own.

When we come, His promise pleading,
He'll be with us in the strife,
And we'll feel His kindly leading
All along the path of life.

Bertha's Trust.

BY GERTRUDE L. VANDERBILT.

(Concluded.)

THERE may be seen in many parts of New England old farm-houses standing empty because their owners have gone West and have not been able either to rent or to sell these farms to advantage. These houses were, at our time, the property of well-to-do farmers, who, at an earlier period, were content to work hard and live simply upon the meagre harvest which was scantily reaped from the unproductive soil. The opening of the wide and fruitful West attracted the descendants of these people, and they were unwilling to live in the simple and economical manner of their fathers, when the rich harvests from a better soil might become theirs. Rather than spend their time and toil upon the granite rocks and barren fields, they followed the westward course of empire, and the old homes stand empty, or are inhabited by those who pay a low rent, such as would be asked for few rooms in a more prosperous locality.

It was in a house such as these that little Bertha and her father lived. In their case, however, they were lineal descendants of those who had formerly occupied and owned the property. The family to whom the ownership had passed was at this time in Colorado. Bertha and her father were allowed to occupy, rent free, just as many of the rooms as they cared to furnish. This occupancy was given with the view of preserving the property from tramps, or worse marauders, and keeping it in repair. It was only the kitchen, two bedrooms and a small family sitting-room which the poor shoemaker could furnish. Even this was more room than the family (now reduced to father and child) needed.

The broad hall, the parlors and the empty chambers on the second floor echoed, with a hollow sound, the voices of those who crossed their threshold. The broad swathe of sunlight moved across the dusty floors without the intercepting and softening of curtain or shutter. The empty rooms looked dreary and depressing; there was no sign of life but the flies buzzing up and down the panes of glass, or an occasional mouse peeping out from below the wainscoting.

At one time during the period of its gradual decadence the house had been used as a stage-house. It was on the old stage-line, north, toward the frontier of Canada. At that time the attic, under the broad gambrel roof, had been "finished off" into a large room to serve as a court-room, for which purpose it was used for several years. Service was held there when the church was undergoing repairs; occasionally a lecture was given there, or it was used as a dancing room for sleighing parties in the winter. It was open to any purpose for which a large room and plenty of space were required, and it had been frequently in demand when it was on the line of local travel.

When the railroad was finished, the station was built in an opposite quarter of the village, and the old line of stage-coaches became only a memory of the past. The direct line of travel left this old house on a deserted curve of the road; from being once in the central, business part of the town, it was now entirely out of the line of communication, and what little prosperity it had once had was now lost.

The poor shoemaker had once been a strong and stalwart young farmer; disabled and crippled by a fall, he was now feeble, and had taken up the present trade, by which he earned a scanty living, as the only means open to him for the support of himself and his child.

There are those whom misfortune seems to pursue. There seemed to be no more opportunities now to rent the large room known as the "court-room." This had been at one time quite a source of revenue to him; it had been, in fact, his main reliance.

Little Bertha could sing merrily about the house, but the disheartened father could only sigh. Yet he had faith and trust,—not the fitful, uncertain trust of little Bertha, but the firm belief that God would care for him and at all times do that which would be for his good.

You wonder, do you, that if they were so very poor this man would not accept the money which had been offered to little Bertha? Ah, well! that is the honest independence in which our American people delight!

When, on the evening of the tableaux vivants, the money which had been collected for the child was returned, at the request of her father, much discussion had ensued among the guests in the parlor as to what disposition should be made of it. Those who had contributed refused to have it returned to them, and it was difficult to determine how it should be disposed of. Many suggestions were made, but they were all open to some objection. It was the Fairy Queen who made the proposition which met with general approval, and which was unanimously accepted as being the only disposal of the money from which Bertha could reap any benefit.

A juvenile Sir Walter Raleigh had been pleading with the Fairy Queen to have a repetition of the tableaux. He liked his dress and thought it becoming, and to expend all its beauty upon the five minutes in which he appeared before the spectators as the great Sir Walter seemed to him like a waste of good material. His proposition offered the hint upon which the queen of the fairies spoke.

"I agree with you, Tommy; let's have a repetition of our tableaux. We have our dresses and all the appurtenances necessary to make them a success. Let's make the most of them. We can have another evening's pleasure out of them just as well as not. Now listen to what I have to propose. Mother, just settle this for us!" recalling her mother who had left the room. "How would this arrangement reconcile all our conflicting difficulties? We might hire the large court-room which Bertha's father rents out whenever he has an application for its use, and that, now-a-days, is not very often, and we could there repeat our tableaux. There would be plenty of room, we can invite our friends and neighbors and all have a pleasant time together. We can add a little more to the money we have collected here, and take that to pay for the use of the "court-room." Then, you see, mother, little Bertha can have the benefit of the money, as we intended she should in the first instance."

There was no dissenting voice to this proposition; it seemed to meet every requirement. As being purely a business transaction, the money would be gladly received—there was no doubt of that. Thus the matter settled itself.

Mrs. Weaver offered to arrange the business of hiring the room for the repetition of the entertainment, but the young people resented the implication that they were not fully able to attend to it themselves. A committee, consisting of Christopher Columbus, George Washington, a flower girl and the Queen of the Fairies, made all the arrangements. They not only engaged the "court-room," but the whole unoccupied part of the house, and they paid for it in advance. This settlement did not meet the approval of Christopher Columbus, who thought it unbusiness-like; but the flower girl argued that it was best to "get the money out of the way first, for then they would have no anxiety in that direction."

They agreed to have their entertainment on the day before Christmas. The decorations kept the young people busy for a week. Creeping cedar, spruce, hemlock, pine-branches and all the wealth of Christmas greens in which our northern forests are so rich were used in the adornment of the house. Little Bertha skipped about from room to room, revelling in the fragrant odors of balsam and fir which filled the air, and rejoicing over the improved aspect of the once dreary rooms, now changed into evergreen bowers, in which branches of bright holly and bittersweet shone like sprays of wet coral.

We do not propose to describe the tableaux: we shall only say that the entertainment was a great success. Something happened on the following day which was of more interest to the child than the evening's entertainment.

Bertha and her father returned home from church on that Christmas Day to find that their room seemed to have been entered in their absence. By whom? Neither Bertha nor her father knew. They could only guess. There was no one even whom they could thank, grateful as they felt! And there was so much to be thankful for!

In what was once the parlor of this old house, but which had never been used as such in Bertha's memory, there was a bright fire upon the hearth, and in the midst of the beautiful evergreen bower (arranged as the reception-room for the tableaux) a table was set, on which was placed a bountiful Christmas dinner. It was a dinner such as Bertha had never seen before. How beautiful it was! All the good things which the rich place on their tables at Christmas were here on this table within this decorated bower! There was not even a hint to discover by whose agency this had been done. The only clue for Bertha lay in the fact that it was not until after Christmas that the keys of the house were returned by the Fairy Queen.

At the close of Christmas Day Bertha sat on her father's knee in front of the blazing fire. She seemed to be thinking. "Father," she said, "God did know best, didn't He? We can trust Him!"

"Yes, my little girl; but you only trusted and believed after you received what you asked for. You doubted when God seemed to withhold that which you desired. Yet often He keeps back from us that for which we pray, so that in the end He may give us more and better things. You must learn to trust Him equally when He gives and when He withholds."

Her father had long ago learned that lesson in the Christian life; it was hard for Bertha; it is hard for all of us. We believe and trust when all things go well with us; when clouds come, then we doubt.

St. Paul's View of the Woman Question;

Or, The Place of Woman in the Social Meeting and Church.

BY THE REV. A. G. VERMILYE, D.D.

Read Before the Pastors' Association.

THE subject-matter to be considered under this heading occupies three chapters of Paul's Epistles, the first two being the 11th and 14th of 1st Corinthians, the other one being the 2d of 1st Timothy. Coming, then, at once to the first of these chapters, viz., 1 Cor. 11, it is only necessary to gather out the plot of the Apostle's argument, which, however, has an important bearing in its relations to the rest of the subject. He is discussing simply and singly the point of a woman praying or prophesying with her head uncovered; of course not at home, but in public, in the assemblies of the Christians. His verdict is, "every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoreth her head;" his reason being, "for it is even all one as if she were shaven"—a matter of uncomeliness and shame. On this point he appeals to themselves: "is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered?" and then closes with the earnest disclaimer: "but if any man seem to be contentious" (about it) "we have no such custom, neither the churches of God," any of them, that is, "no such custom" as praying or prophesying "with the head uncovered."

I remark upon this, then, First, that the custom, in itself considered, of women praying and prophesying in Christian assemblies, existed. And evidently, now that the very question was before him, lying under his hand for adjudication if he so chose, now, if the Apostle had objections to make or considered the matter as a principle and intended to forbid it, now was the specific time for doing so. On the contrary, what shocked him was want of modesty and decorum (as those times regarded it) in the way. His argument and appeal are addressed solely to this; and then the subject is closed for another.

2d. His objection is in behalf of woman, woman's modesty. It goes no farther. But what a delicate sentiment he displays, and appreciation of woman's glory! Liberty, indeed, where proper, but modesty ever! "Woman," he says, "is the glory of the man," as "he is the image and glory of God!" High position! But then it is the modest woman. Christianity and nature are at one in this. Nature, likewise, meant her to be modest; "for" (not indeed, according to Darwin, but according to Paul—how Christianity refines with beautiful sentiment what it touches!) her hair (her beauty and glory) was "given her for a covering" and veil.

We may now quit this passage, as exhibited sufficiently for our purpose, and pass to the next, viz., 1 Cor. 14. In doing so, and in seeking Paul's meaning, first of all, let us not do him the injustice of supposing him inconsistent with himself or of writing in one chapter what he takes back or nullifies three chapters after. But he has been written to about various matters which he takes up and answers one by one. He has answered about praying and prophesying "with the head uncovered," in the interests of womanly modesty and decorum. He now comes to another question and decides it, but on grounds quite different.

Let us, at this point, peep into an assembly of the Christians. "Every one hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation," and so on. Some are praying, some are prophesying. What confusion, what a hubbub! It is instructive to notice here that all this excitement, this intoxication of zeal and devotion was the direct result and overflow of the inspiration of the Spirit of God. Yes, but as the tropical forest is, with its wild and tangled and unwholesome exuberance; as all life is; which yet for health and beauty and usefulness must (as nature's law) be kept within bounds. It is in this sense that Paul says, "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace, as in all churches of the saints;" and therefore he says, "let all things be done unto edifying," and, "let all things be done decently and in order." Away, then, with all "salvation army" methods, with its castanets and tomtoms; away even (we may say) with things we sometimes fear to touch, lest we interfere with the Spirit of God! It is not permitted to vulgarize and trangress the natural decency of religion under plea of something religious.

It is in this connection of order and decency in the churches, because "God is not the author of confusion, but of peace," that we confront the text (v. 34), "Let your women keep silence in the churches; for it is not permitted unto them to speak; but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law. And (v. 35) if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for women to speak in the church."

I now propose to gather around these central verses what remains of the elucidation of the subject; by side lights and reflecting lights—the Word of God reflected upon itself—to discover, if may be, what Paul really meant by this forbidding "to speak," in Greek the word being λαλειν. Was it that utter eclipse and silence, to which woman has been so long doomed, whatever her gifts, in our meetings and churches? Two remarks, then, are here pertinent:

1st. The preceding chapter (as I have already shown) requires us to eliminate from his prohibition praying and prophesying. He has done with them; they are not in his mind.

2d. As to prophesying, let us hear Paul's own definition. It was something to edify (build up), something in the way of exhortation, and comfort (chap. 14: 3), something heart searching (v. 25) and prophetic of its secrets. Prayer was speaking unto God; prophesying, "unto men" (chap. 14: 3), and among spiritual gifts, they were to desire "rather that they might prophesy." Moreover, it was one of the predicted signs. "Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy." Now suppose one of these gifted spiritual women, under an impulse of the Spirit, to rise in some Christian assembly to pray or, especially, to prophesy! What would Paul say? Would he say, "Sit down, sister, this is one of the 'forbidden and abhorrent forces;' you must not 'speak,' but be silent!" The answer is, he has not so ruled upon the subject. They must observe womanly modesty; they must observe a proper church decorum, and have regard "that all things be done unto edifying;" under such conditions he would not interfere. But, then, beyond that, there was a point where the objection rose into a principle; at which they were "commanded to be under obedience, as also said the law."

It will help us if we now, and for the present, turn to the third passage, viz., 1 Tim. 2. The reason is, that Paul cannot be inconsistent with himself; and that this chapter to Timothy is, in substance, a resume of the two chapters to the Corinthians, which were evidently in his mind. The first part is about prayer, wherein (v. 8) he says: "I will, therefore, that men pray everywhere, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting." "In like manner, also (v. 9), that women"—now what? Our translation says, "adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety." But (as Ellicott and others have noticed) the sentence is elliptical; there is something to be supplied, and two constructions are almost equally good; either, "In like manner, also, I will that women adorn themselves"—or, "I will that women in praying adorn themselves in modest apparel," etc.; in which latter the "holy hands" for the men, and the "modest apparel," the "shamefacedness," and the "sobriety" for the women are conspicuously in opposition, and the allusion to 1 Cor. 11 seems clear and perfect. And now, following this, what have we? (V. 11): "Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection;" as he had said in 1 Cor. 14: 35, "if they will learn anything, let them ask their husbands at home; for it is a shame for women to speak in the church." And then (v. 12): "But I suffer not a woman to teach"—(to be what I am, "a preacher, and an apostle [v. 7], a teacher of the Gentiles"), nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be "in silence"—as he had said before in 1 Cor. 14: 34, "let your women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak (rather teach); but they are commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law." There is a reason here, and a principle. In Timothy he gives it in full: "For Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." That reason, I beg you to notice, is generic and permanent. Adam first formed, and then her easy credulity and transgression. It is as old as Eden; and because of it she must be "under obedience." It is Gospel founded on nature and law. Teaching, however, implies authority, and she must not "usurp authority over the man." And if she would learn "anything," as implying interruption, question, and perhaps discussion; the same underlying law is, "silence with all subjection"—asking her husband at home.

Returning, at this point, to 1 Cor. 14: 34, there is one remaining thing to be considered, viz., the difference between διδασκειν (to teach), in Timothy, and λαλειν (to speak), in Corinthians. It is, indeed, Paul's use and understanding of the word we are after. But even apparent difference disappears as inconsequent, if we regard only the general usage of λαλειν. It occurs 247 times in the New Testament, in such connections as these: God the Father speaking to Christ or to men; the Holy Spirit—"the Spirit of your Father"—speaking in and through the apostles; Christ, angels, speaking; and men in most solemn circumstances, teaching the doctrines of God, for instance. But in each case the idea is one of authority, closely allied to teaching. And what idea, I now ask, has Paul evidently in mind, in these verses, but an assumption of authority, unnatural and unbecoming to woman, who, instead of teaching or preaching, is "commanded to be under obedience, as also saith the law."

In conclusion, Providence is always thrusting upon, and agitating us with new questions, or old questions in new forms and connections. The Fathers did not have all truth, nor have we; and despite systems and study, theology ever remains a science not quite finished. There always remains over from one age some formally received but neglected truth, something to be revised, something to be readjusted, something undetected in the spirit, or wrongly or imperfectly drawn from the letter of divine truth.

Our own age is furnishing its own quota of problems and questions about the Bible itself, inspiration, its relations to science, probation after death, with many more relating to society and life; questions, some of them decided long ago, and yet to be decided again. Here, too, is the woman question—her rights, education and general place in nature. Providence is thrusting it forward. And amid the flood of books and discussion, what does the Bible say? What are its principles, germs of wise thought and authority, from which we may reason? How does Paul stand, in view of what is going on around us? If "it is a shame for women to speak—even to speak—in the church," it must be so (apparently) anywhere else, and she is relegated to old-fashioned silence; or the age flows past Paul, no longer an authority, and leaves him hopelessly stranded on this rock! On the other hand, would it not be a relief to many to find, on re-examination, just what Paul forbids, and the Biblical reason why? to be able to use the spiritual gifts of some gifted spiritual woman in prayer and "edification and exhortation and comfort," and not be forced to depend, in sorrowful helplessness, upon some stupid old drone of a man?

Paul, if our view be correct, was, indeed, legislating only for the church, but on principles that are general. What he gave liberty to do must be done modestly, and with regard to decorum. And what is a woman without modesty? And in our American society and homes, if there be no corrective and check, no antidote of womanly modesty and sweetness, what a thing society will become? We can stand upon that, for it is nature's teaching, too. Christianity does but take nature's highest type, and refine it with piety. As beyond this liberty, however, and forbidden, is preaching. His reason is generic. She is out of her sphere who attempts to preach. There is a natural relation and fitness implied in the words "first made"—if nothing else, which make it against nature's law, and therefore God's law. And upon that we can stand—with Paul, nature and the fitness of things, at one.

A Thought for the New Year.

I WISH this could reach the eyes of all the ladies in our city, for I know it then would touch their hearts, not from any merit of its own, but simply from the fact that it will cause them to think. What I am about to speak of is a custom of New Year's day, that great day in society and in our lives. It is the time of all others when most people, realizing that another year has gone with its burden of good, and, in many cases, its so much heavier burden of evil deeds, think of the past and its failures, and resolve for the coming year to make the world better, not worse, for their having lived in it.

Now, I speak to the ladies. Will you, knowing what you do, deliberately plant the seed of evil and sorrow in many homes on this day? I can see you start in indignation at the accusation or question; yet that is what you are doing. How many of you, mothers and sisters, loving your husbands, sons and brothers dearly, will for the sake of them and their friends risk public opinion and banish the decanter from the table in your reception room? If you, leaders in society, would start this good work, a great, great number, who have had the will but not the courage, will follow so speedily that this desired reform may soon become the fashion, that despot at present ruling so many homes. Probably oftener than you suspect your hand has offered a young man his first glass, the temptation has come through you, and only the future will show what evil has been done. You may never hear or know of the bitter reproaches with which many speak and think of you as having helped to ruin a character, cause a drunkard's life, fill a drunkard's grave.

I have heard young men say: "What could we do; we could not refuse wine when offered us by a lady." Young men of a certain age cannot face the ridicule that their acquaintances know so well how to bestow; to escape it, they will take this first step toward destruction, even knowing that, once having given way, they will not have the power to resist in the future.

Now, my friends, I appeal to you: Cannot we, mothers, wives, sisters, help our sons, husbands and brothers, if instead of weakly, for the sake of doing as others do, we refuse to put temptation in their way. Nay, refuse to invite them to do evil under the false name of hospitality. Surely, true hospitality can be shown in ways that are not harmful.

You will find that all true men will admire and respect you more for your courage and your thought for them; as for those who go from house to house for the attractions of the punch-bowl, and that alone, do you wish them as friends? Gentlemen will not disdain a cup of good coffee, bouillon or chocolate in place of wine.

Paris City Mission.

ESTABLISHED in 1879 by the late Lord Shaftesbury, this mission has been acting as an auxiliary to the other evangelical forces in Paris. France is now open to the Gospel. Professor Yeatman asserts that now, "for the first time in the history of France, is religious liberty the birthright of every citizen." Twenty years ago no religious meeting exceeding twenty in number could be held, and then never without a policeman being present.

In 1813, there were only 150 Protestant pastors in France, now there are 900, beside orphan homes, asylums, reformatories, and other results of Christian effort. In 1875, the French Bible Society circulated only 16,000 copies of Scriptures, but in 1885 the circulation was increased to 60,000. The "Societe Centrale" began with three missionaries, it now employs 170, and has opened 360 mission stations. In 1871, a Lancashire pastor, on a holiday tour, was distributing tracts in the Belleville district, when the words of a workingman led him to resign his charge and commence a mission in Paris. To-day the M'All Mission has thirty-six halls in Paris and sixty in other parts of France.

Mr. M'All, in a letter expressing his opinion of the situation, said: "The alternative for France is that it be flooded with the Gospel, or moral, social, total ruin." Such being the case, we are glad to see the report of the work of the Paris City Mission, and hope that the little band of missionaries, seven in number, may soon be increased to seventy, especially when we find the following record of the work accomplished:

Domiciliary and sick visits, 54,413; meetings held or attended, 11,684; attendance at meetings, 345,838; Bibles and Testaments sold or given away, 10,087; tracts and portions distributed, 171,274.—The Christian.

Our Book-Shelves.

....“THE FAMILY. AN HISTORICAL AND SOCIAL STUDY.” By Charles F. Thwing and Carrie F. Butler Thwing. This volume is a timely contribution to a subject of great importance. It contains a great deal of information and many useful suggestions. It treats of the Pre-historic Family, and of the institution among the Greeks, Romans and Jews, in the first Christian centuries, in the Middle Ages, and among Roman Catholics and Protestants. After this come chapters on its divine and human basis, and its relation to social order, to its individual members and to property. The closing chapters analyze the Socialist substitutes for it and dwell on divorce and its causes and effects. Together with much that is good [illegible] tionable things. It denies [illegible]ined the family (p. 148). It denies the ordination of woman, and in reply to the Apostle [illegible]l's statements on the matter, says that his opinions were “colored by the prejudices of his time” (p. 146). But despite these follies, the volume is adapted to do good. One prophecy it makes we should be glad to see fulfilled. “In time the tide of population which now sets so strongly toward the city, will turn, and will here, as in England, run toward the country” (p. 110). (Lee & Shepard.)

....“THE MIRACULOUS ELEMENT IN THE GOSPELS.” By the Rev. A. B. Bruce, D.D., Professor in the Free Church College, Glasgow. The spirit and manner in which the evidences of Christianity are treated to-day differ widely from those that prevailed a generation earlier. In former times, anyone who expressed a doubt concerning the claims and contents of the Bible was counted as an enemy to revealed religion, who was maliciously seeking to overthrow it. To-day the doubts and difficulties of honest men are respected, considered, and, whenever possible, removed. The science of Apologetics, while assuming a less polemic tone, has gained in breadth, and obtains the attention and respect of those whose prejudices or errors it seeks to remove. The volume before us presents, in an admirable manner, this conciliatory spirit. It contains the ten lectures delivered by Prof. Bruce at the Union Theological Seminary in this city upon the Ely Foundation. The author's aim is to examine the miracles recorded in the Gospels, so far as possible, in the same manner that the marvellous in other narratives is tested, thus reducing to a minimum the residuum of difficulty to be removed by an appeal to the infallibility of the inspired evangel. The lectures are especially valuable for the full and candid manner in which the opinions of those who reject the miraculous are stated and met. In fact, so fair is the author's representation of the views of others, that it requires some care at times not to confound an opinion which he is simply stating with those which he is defending.

The volume is consistent and effective along the line of the author's purpose to keep the question of inspiration in the background; yet it seems to us that an additional chapter, stating a positive doctrine concerning the inspiration and authority of the Gospels, while in nowise weakening the preceding argument, would have added greatly to the value of the work for Christian students and candid “seekers after God.”

A topical index fitly closes the book and adds to its usefulness. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

....“JOHN CONSCIENCE OF KINGSEAL.” By John M. Bamford. The writer's aim seems to be to infuse modern life with the strongest religious spirit, and in carrying it out, he has adopted something of Bunyan's style in naming prominent characters. The book tells of an English factory where the master first becomes converted thoroughly, and then strives to convert his rough workmen. Some of the characters are strongly drawn, as in the case of “Yorkshire Joe,” and workmen's arguments for religion and against it are given with great force. But the book makes, we think, too much of difficulties which certainly have little place in the mind of the ordinary mechanic. Even with this fault, we think its circulation among the Workmen's Clubs would be of benefit, for it is undoubtedly written with a peculiar directness and power, and takes up, in the right way, those labor questions with which so many minds are puzzled. (Phillips & Hunt.)

....“IN ALL TIME OF OUR TRIBULATION.” By Emily S. Holt. The scenes of Miss Holt's tale are laid in the Court of Edward the Second, in the first quarter of the fourteenth century. It is a careful [illegible]l study, with a religious purpose running all through its parts. The sad fate of the king, with the perfidy of his queen and nobles, are well described; but the scenes are so far removed from our own day, and the thought and language so antique, that we fear the profit of the work will be gained by only a few of the more reflective readers. (Robert Carter & Brothers.)

....“SUSANNA WESLEY.” By Eliza Clarke. (Famous Women Series.) The mother of the famous Wesleys is here shown from a somewhat different standpoint than a Methodist biographer would assume. She was the toiling and tried wife of a poor rector, the mother of nineteen children, and her work was done under the greatest difficulties. She had a mind above the average, independent and courageous, and yet with strict ideas as to proper subordination. Her great sons did not always find their mother wholly in sympathy with them in her judgment of the character of their doctrines. In fact, the majority of those who have since borne their name have adhered to the Church of England. This biography gives us a high idea of the motherly side of Susanna Wesley, and the whole book, with its capital arrangement and selection of letters, shows us that a woman, through the training she gives her children, is sometimes capable of wielding an immense influence. (Roberts Brothers.)

....“THE MAGAZINE OF AMERICAN HISTORY” has completed its sixteenth volume and comes to us as a handsome book, with its numbers from July to December bound together. The articles are of the greatest interest to every historical student, as they are monographs on topics which the authors have carefully studied and which often throw great light on the larger events ordinarily recited by historians. The illustrations of the volume add greatly to its value, the portraits especially being above the average merit. A complete index closes the six hundred pages of the work.

...HOLIDAY CARDS.—Messrs. Raphael Tuck & Sons publish an almost endless variety of cards for Christmas and New Year. They have taken a wide range in designs. Many are pertinent to the season, others would be as appropriate for midsummer as midwinter gifts; but they go to make up the variety desired by those who make books of cards. All of the designs are artistic and pleasing, and are handsomely printed in colors.

....“OLD BONIFACE.” By Geo. H. Picard. The love adventures of a pretty American girl in London form the scenes in this breezy story. There are descriptions of places in and around the great city which match as deftly with the persons strolling through them as in some of Dickens' best-loved books. The style is quick, bright and entertaining from the beginning to the end, and no reader will be disappointed at the capital sequel. We have been rarely pleased with “Old Boniface,” and commend it to all lovers of sparkling comedy. (White, Stokes & Allen.)

....“THEIR PILGRIMAGE.” By Charles Dudley Warner. Every reader of Harper's has smiled over the witty and keen descriptions of social resorts and summer pleasures as given in the pages of “Their Pilgrimage,” and many will gladly welcome the book which connects the whole series of great hotels from Fortress Monroe to Alexandria Bay. The illustrations by Reinhart are reduced in size, but all their best features are retained. We cannot help marking the tasteful binding which now is seen on our best American books. Taking “Their Pilgrimage” in hand, we should say it had been bound in Paris. There has certainly been a great advance made by our leading publishing houses in printing and binding during the last five years. (Harper & Brothers.)

....“HUMOROUS MASTERPIECES FROM AMERICAN LITERATURE.” Edited by Edward T. Mason. Three volumes. These are convenient and pleasant books to have within reach in moments of leisure, especially of weariness, dullness of spirit, or of despondency. Their chief object is to amuse, and they are amusing, embracing, as they do, some of the choicest bits of humorous writing, from the time of Irving to the present day. Prose and poetry are intermingled, the prose selections, however, largely predominating. The reader can hardly go amiss of finding some things and many things in these pages suited to his taste, pleasing to his fancy, and reviving to his spirits if they droop. Reading circles will find them adapted to their needs. We heartily commend them. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

....“THE DRAGON, IMAGE AND DEMON” is the symbolical title of a volume on “The Three Religions of China: Confucianism, Buddhism and Taoism,” giving an account of the Mythology, Idolatry and Demonolatry of the Chinese, by Rev. Hampden C. Der Bose, fourteen years a missionary of the Southern Presbyterian Church, U. S., at Souchow. The facts have been taken largely from native sources and also from works of recognized authority by missionaries and other well-known writers on the Middle Kingdom. The Dragon is the emblem of China and the State Church (Confucianism); the Image represents Buddhism—the religion imported from India—and which the author not inaptly styles “The Night of Asia,” and Taoism is the Demon worship of China. The work is done in lively and popular style, and profusely illustrated with wood-cuts. The publishers have issued it in elegant form, with calendered paper, clear and handsome type, and typical binding. It will make a fine holiday book, and is of permanent worth as a treasury of information. (A. C. Armstrong & Son.)

Our Library Table.

Periodicals, Serials and Notes.

....The Atlantic for January starts off well for the new year. A decided novelty is a serial story, “The Second Son,” written by Mrs. Oliphant and T. B. Aldrich in conjunction. Critics can now have full opportunity for discriminating between the masculine and feminine style. Philip G. Hamerton gives a very fine paper on “French and English,” in which he makes some strong points against the stricter views in regard to Sunday. A new serial begins from the pen of F. Marion Crawford, and George F. Parsons has a second powerful attack on the “saloon,” showing its influence on society. The “little essays” of the Contributors' Club are especially bright in this number.

....Lippincott's Magazine begins the new year with an extra dash of red upon its cover, as if to forecast a still deeper dye of sensationalism. It is, however, a number of extraordinary interest. The novellette is by Julian Hawthorne, with the significant title of “Sinfire.” Sidney Luska follows him up with “The Story of Angela.” An interview between Senator Ingalls and Mr. Howells is reported, and poor old Walt Whitman maunders about himself, as usual. Barrett Wendell gives considerable information about student life in Harvard College. Edgar Fawcett turns fiercely and justly upon his critics with the question, “Should Critics be Gentlemen?” W. H. Babcock shows up the absurdity of the Henry George movement. Miss Cleveland makes her bow as a verse-maker in the somewhat Browning-esque poem, “The Dilemma of the 19th Century.” The “Monthly Gossip” and “Book Table” continue their onslaught upon the heresies of Mr. Howells as to fiction.

....Harper's Monthly for January is distinguished by three timely and valuable illustrated articles: “New Orleans,” by Charles Dudley Warner; “The French Navy,” by Sir Edward J. Reed; and “Campaigning with the Cossacks,” by Frank D. Millet,—the latter illustrated by the author himself, and all in the finest style of art. Richard Malcom Johnston contributes one of his incomparable Southern dialect stories, and a story of Russian life is begun by Kathleen O'Meara. A generous instalment of over fifty pages is given of Blackmore's “Springhaven,” and E. P. Roe continues “The Home Acre.” Mr. Curtis writes charmingly on the New Year and the Bartholdi Statue, and talks plainly about Julian Hawthorne's outrage upon Mr. Lowell. Mr. Howells chats about holiday literature, past and present.

Coffee or Cocoa Rooms, Which?

MR. FREDERICK GORE, representing the Coffee-House Association of England, has been visiting this city, and advocating the formation of a similar association here. Mr. G. Monroe Royce advocates the Cocoa Rooms system, and gives strong reasons for his preference. He writes to The Churchman. The substance of his statement is as follows:

"The Coffee-house System" in England is conducted by joint-stock companies, by associations, and by private individuals. It provides coffee, tea, and chocolate to drink, and everything in the way of edibles necessary to a plain breakfast, luncheon, or dinner. It also provides papers, reading-rooms, and sometimes amusements, musical and otherwise.

The buildings are usually large, substantial structures, and some are of fine architectural proportions, fitted up in a beautiful and, in two or three instances, in an almost elegant manner. The Cobden Coffee-House at Birmingham is a case in point, and must have cost between $75,000 and $100,000. This coffee-house tavern is in the very centre of the busiest part of the town, and does a thriving and a most decidedly paying business. But it competes more with a certain class of hotels and eating-houses than with the drinking-places; and this, I think, is the weak moral point in the coffee-house system.

These eating-places do not come into direct competition with the public-houses, or, as we say in America, the drinking-saloons, and their moral success in the cause of temperance is not, therefore, I think, to be measured by their financial success. That they exert a good moral influence I have no doubt, but they cannot, in the nature of things, become the mortal foes of the saloons.

A little observation by anyone familiar with the English lower classes will, I think, clearly demonstrate this fact. The great majority of the people one sees in such coffee-houses as "The Cobden" are of the lower middle, and not of the lower and laboring classes. This statement, I think, applies to all of the large and costly "coffee palaces," as they are sometimes appropriately called, especially where there are musical evenings and other social amusements.

They are most excellent institutions for the provincial towns of England, but they have not succeeded, and I fear will not, in the metropolis. They are good things in the provinces, not so much as rivals to drinking-houses, but as clean, healthy, decent, and cheerful places of resort for the lower middle classes—especially for the clerks, shop-girls, and mill employes. A few mechanics and a few farmers (when marketing) use these coffee-houses, but very few of the common day-laborers are ever seen within them.

I spent one week at "The Ossington Coffee Palace," in Newark, Nottinghamshire. This coffee-house is beautifully situated upon the banks of the winding Trent, and commands a fine view of an extensive valley. My room overlooked a beautiful landscape, in the foreground of which were the ruins of the historical Newsted Abbey, where King John sought refuge and found death. My room cost me five shillings ($1.25) for the week, and my total expenses were less than $4. The guests were mostly commercial travellers. "The Ossington" is, I think, all things considered, the handsomest building of the class in England.

It has all the appointments of an English inn stabling included. It is kept clean, the food is well cooked and nicely served, and it is altogether a most comfortable place to stop at. It has a reading-room and a library, a gymnasium, a billiard-room, and a large hall for public entertainments. Such an institution is, of course, a great blessing to any community, especially the poorer classes, but it does not come into direct and mortal conflict with the drinking-saloon. The Ossington Coffee Palace was erected by Lady Ossington as a memorial to her nephew, F. W. Denison, who sacrificed his life in East London in a noble effort to better the sad condition of "outcast London."

After what I have now said, I do not think that I can be accused of any hostile purpose to the coffee-house system, as represented by Mr. Gore. It is doing excellent work in every way, and is well suited to the smaller towns—and some of the large towns—but, in my opinion, it is not what we want in New York city. We want something that will wage a deadly and hand-to-hand combat with our ten thousand drinking saloons; and I believe that the "cocoa rooms" system, as established and conducted in London by the "Lockhart Cocoa Rooms Co.," is the model upon which our plans should be drawn. These are comparatively small rooms distributed throughout London and are increasing at an enormous rate. They furnish cocoa, i.e., chocolate, tea and coffee, cake, bread, butter, and sausages. They don't provide other meals or vegetables, and do not, therefore, come into any serious conflict with eating places. These rooms are fitted up something like our American drinking-saloons. They have a neat and inviting exterior, and a clean, comfortable, and cheerful interior. Everything is served from a counter, very like a saloon counter. Upon this counter are placed bright and shining tea, coffee and chocolate boilers, and behind the counter are "tidy" girls who are always polite and obliging. One pays at the counter, and selects one's own seat at any of the tables. These tables are provided with the daily papers and such simple games as "checkers." One can get a large cup of tea, chocolate, or coffee for two cents, and two large slices of bread and butter, or bread and jam for an additional two cents. Thus for less than five cents one can get something to eat and something "to wash it down with." This means death to the saloons; they can't compete with such an institution, and the fact is that in every neighborhood where these cocoa-rooms have been established in London the drinking-saloons are doing a most unprofitable business, and many of them have been compelled to close their doors. The coffee-house system has failed in London, but the "cocoa-rooms" system is a great success. The projectors of this system make no professions of philanthropic intentions, and they really have none.

The Lockhart cocoa-rooms system was established and is conducted solely on a paying basis, and it pays a much larger dividend than any of the coffee-houses, the Cobden not excepted. The Lockhart system, however, is not confined to London, and is making rapid strides into the midland and the northern counties. If a company should be formed in New York upon the "cocoa-rooms" principle, I believe it would pay a dividend from the beginning, and few saloons would continue to prosper in their immediate neighborhood.

This movement is too important to be entered into without careful thought and deliberation. I am convinced that it will prove a great success in New York, if it is started on the proper principles.

AUNT MARJORIE'S CORNER.

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR" to our readers and contributors, the circle of friends who so often and so kindly assure us of their appreciation of this "Corner" of the paper. Please take the familiar phrase as a personal greeting, the sincere heart-wish of one who, if she could, would like to look into your eyes, clasp your hands, and tell you how sincerely she hopes that the coming year may multiply your joys and lessen your sorrows, relieve your anxieties and lighten your burdens. It is a sweet and comforting thought that all our years are in the dear Lord's hand, and that each of us, for herself, may say, with blessed assurance, "Thou wilt keep him (her) in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

We are greatly indebted to the friends who so often aid us in "Aunt Marjorie's Corner," and we would be glad to increase their number. In this free and easy man's exchange there is a place for every one who can give advice, state a perplexity, send a bright bit of news or a household receipt; who, in brief, can in any way minister to her sisters. Think of this "Corner," not merely as a department in your Church paper, but as a cosy little retreat, with an open fire blazing cheerily on the hearth, a lamp on the table, a sofa inviting the tired head to rest on its pillow, and chairs for everybody standing about in just the positions you most prefer. Enter and be seated. Do not be afraid to speak. If you do not agree with the rest of us, please say so frankly. Useful as the "Corner" has been, it may be of more value hereafter if you will all realize that it belongs to you, being only conducted in your interest by your friend,

AUNT MARJORIE.

Christmas Hymn

(For the Little Ones.)

ONCE a star the wise men led
To the Lord of glory;
Once to shepherds angels sang
Such a sweet, sweet story.

In the dark, still night they came
To the shepherds lowly,
But they brought a splendor bright
From their home most holy.

One fair angel sang alone,
Softly downward flying:
"Fear not, shepherds, Christ your Lord
Born on earth, is lying

"In a manger, gently laid, Ye shall find Him yonder."
Then a multitude with him
Sang this song of wonder:

"Glory be to God on high,
Far above in heaven;
Peace on earth to men of peace
Down below be given!"

Then the song drew back to heaven,
And a hush is falling,
Yet the shepherds through the night
Hear it faintly calling.

We can hear the same sweet song,
Sweetest song and story;
"Christ is born! Your Lord is come!
Glory, ever glory!"

Now come thoughtful words about

The Meaning of the Christmas Holly.

BY MARY R. BALDWIN.

IT is recorded that the early Christians in Rome chose the holly for Christmas decorations. Did the scarlet berries, against the dark background of leaves, make a contrast that suggested to them the deeper meanings of the birth of the Christ with all its promise to man, against the shadow of the Cross upon which He hung? We imagine so, for at the approach of the Christmas-tide we involuntarily make our contrasts, and most of the world's sad or glad experience comes from comparison of extremes. If, as has been written,

"Sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things," then may not joy's crown of joy be remembering darker days?

Willingly or unwillingly, we all of us, as the day approaches that lies close to where the year's record is finished, put the bright against the dark, and the effect is cheerful and hopeful, or sad and depressing, according to our vision. So many of us seem to have grown away from the ability to enjoy a hearty Christmas cheer that it becomes painful to us to witness the merry-makings of those who are able to take fresh draughts from the springs of joy.

Scrooge, in his dream, was forced to witness the delightful abandon of the children, "every child conducting itself like forty children," and making him long to have "the license of a child, and yet to be man enough to know its value." To be a child, pure and simple, would not have been desirable to him, for the long years in which he had grown away from such an experience, years in which the memories of childhood's innocence and delight had not held him from the hardening process, until with gold for his god he had cut himself clear from the interests of his kind, reproached him; but to be a child only for a few moments and to take his man's experience back with him—this was Scrooge's desire, and is it not the desire of many in real life?

Through the strife of the world, through the dust-clouds of labor, we all of us come to a time when the past confronts us; then, if we will, we may take an offered angel's hand and for a time renew ourselves in sympathy with a child's joy. But we come back wishing to stay no longer unless the experience of years may be allowed to help us to appreciate its happiness and fulfil its ends.

So many of us, when hanging our Christmas emblems, take only the dark leaves. We go over the past, we see every mistake of the years, every wrong done to another, every shortcoming in achievement; and we groan that the past is forever shut to us as a field of action, or a chance of undoing. "Oh, if I could live it all over! If I could take back the passionate expression that sent a pang to a loving heart! If I could be allowed an opportunity for making the most of my time, talents, and energies!" Above the grave of these possibilities how the world sits groaning, seeing no light, no hope, no fruition! hearing not the voice that whispers to the soul of the true mission of all suffering and of all mistakes—the mission that if the soul through a repentance so thorough that it needs not to be repented of, and a faith so firm that it grasps the rock—Christ Jesus—learns to recognize, he may find himself lifted to a higher purpose, and possessing a sweet sense of forgiveness, feel that "Evil is only the slave of good; Sorrow the servant of joy," and so may freely mix the bright berries of the holly among the dark leaves, and warm and light, and beautify and deepen the Christmas experience.

Here is an article of timely suggestiveness:

The Breakfast Table Setting the Pitch for the Day.

"God laid
The key-note of all harmonies; He planned
All perfect combinations, and He made Us so that we could hear and understand."

—M. G. Brainard.

THIS morning at breakfast father looked pleasantly across the table and inquired: "E——, when you wrote about those bears, did you say anything about forbear?" I smiled, and replied: "I mentioned four bears, father—the brown bear, the black bear, the grizzly bear, the Syrian bear." I paused, and there was silence for a moment in our family group; we all understood so well what father meant. The word forbear was to be the key-note of all harmonies throughout the day. Our breakfast table was the tuning-fork used in setting the pitch for us all. Perhaps some remark had been made, which had led father to foresee that forbearance would be needed to prevent distressing discords in our hearts, or in the hearts of others we would meet to-day, and thus we were reminded of the story we had heard. A quarrelsome man and wife became very peaceable. The neighbors inquired the cause. Two bears had been welcomed into their home—their names were Bear and Forbear. Father wants us not only to keep these bears in our home, but to make them our inseparable companions wherever we go. They will prove far more profitable than the travelling bears, one of which so recently called to see us.

To help us to preserve sweet harmony in our hearts and in our home, father placed a stained glass window at the head of the staircase in our upper hall. The subject, "Harmony," is illustrated by the picture of a young girl seated at a pipe-organ in the interior of a church. On one of the church windows "the sweet psalmist of Israel" is represented with his harp. Both of these, the king and the maiden—"players on instruments,"—are also making melody in their hearts unto the Lord "with voices sweet entuned." A young man is seated near the organ, listening with rapt devotion. The words of the psalmist are thus brought to remembrance: "Both young men and maidens, old men and children: Let them praise the name of the Lord."

As each morning we pass this window, on our way to breakfast, we realize—

"Heard melodies are sweet, but these unheard are sweeter."

"The hidden soul of harmony" is present, as we gather round the table, and it softly whispers:

"Wisdom and Love never meet, but the spirit of Music is near them,
When the heart speaks lend thine ear,—lend thine ear, for its language is song!"

The one "word fitly spoken" from heart and lips we reverence and love, has called forth notes

"Of linked sweetness, long drawn out," through all the hours to-day. It has likewise proved to be the key-note of "celestial harmonies." These have —"swept by us as a messenger Carrying a message that was meant for us," which has floated down the ages from the lips of Paul:

"I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called. With all lowliness and meekness, with long suffering, forbearing one another in love. Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

We will have another key-note to-morrow morning, when we meet around the breakfast table, which will set the pitch for another day.

"The Father spake! In grand reverberations
Through space rolled on the mighty music tide,
While to its low majestic modulations,
The clouds of chaos slowly swept aside.
. . . . . .
And wheresoever in His rich creation,
Sweet music breathes—in wave, or bird, or soul,—
'Tis but the faint and far reverberation
Of that great tune to which the planets roll."

The Open Window.

WE ask the attention of all readers who are interested in that beautiful charity—charity in the sense of love, rather than of alms-giving,—the Shut In Society, to the beautiful little periodical published monthly under its auspices. Nothing else that we know of is designed only for invalids. Under the editorial care of Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, it is so bright, so cheery, so tonic, that its presence in a sick chamber is a benediction. Physicians sometimes deprecate the introduction of religious reading into the room of the sufferer from nerve-exhaustion, because they fear it may depress rather than elevate. No doctor who should read a half-dozen numbers of the Open Window could fail to see in its cheery pages, devout as they are, a stimulant and encouragement to his most sensitive patient.

The price of the magazine is fifty cents a year.

Its continued publication will be assured so long as it is supported by the liberality of those who can afford to subscribe for it, not only for themselves, but for ailing persons who are too poor to pay even the annual half-dollar. Any person who chooses may become an associate in this blessed ministry to the Lord's poor and stricken ones by the payment annually of one dollar. Miss E E Burge, 370 Clinton street, Brooklyn, N. Y., will receive subscriptions to the Open Window and applications for membership in the society, and will give much fuller information than our space permits.

In this connection I wish to speak also of our own special periodical,

THE MISSION GLEANER.

It costs but twenty-five cents a year, and once in two months brings to you the latest letters of our women missionaries in our three foreign fields. It cannot be anything else than interesting, because it contains the freshest news from abroad, written as women write who have something to tell to people of whose sympathy they are certain. Every family which takes THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER should at once send twenty-five cents for The Mission Gleaner. I am almost ashamed to add that in consequence of the present meagre subscription list, the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions is considering the necessity of largely reducing the number of copies published. Mr. R. Brinkerhoff, Synod's Rooms, 34 Vesey street, will receive subscriptions to this little periodical.

CHILDREN'S PORTFOLIO.

The Bernard's Christmas Dinner.

(Founded on Fact.)

IT was the day before Christmas, in the year of our Lord 1870. A busy throng of men and women, boys and girls, were upon the Rue de Clichy, but they no longer seemed like the gay Parisians whom one might have expected to meet. Even upon the faces of the children was a pale, woe-begone look, as if it were long since they had breakfasted, and they waited impatiently for dinner. Hungry, half-starved men and women stood in groups upon the corners of the streets, and talked in low-spoken words. It was the muttering of the thunder-storm soon to break with violence over beautiful Paris, leaving it, when the Communists passed by, a fearful wreck. Napoleon III. a few short years ago had found it a "city of brick." He left it a "city of marble." But where was he now? Sedan told the story—a prisoner, an exile. The Empress Eugenie, of whom all Paris once was proud, had fortunately escaped. Softly, at midnight, with an American friend for protector, she had crept down the private staircase of the palace, entered a close carriage in waiting, had been hurried on board a steamer and taken to England, where, meeting her husband, she was kindly and warmly received in her adversity.

Paris was no longer proud; she was humbled in the dust. A Prussian army surrounded her walls. The sieg had begun! Already three months had passed by. Money was scarce, and provisions daily becoming scarcer. Even the wealthy were dependent upon the government butcher for daily rations of horse-meat—one half-pound being allowed to a person for two days.

No wonder that the Bernard family, consisting of madame and her three children, Lisette, Adele, Marie, thought with anxiety of their Christmas dinner. For Babette, the maid, had returned without the daily rations. She, poor thing, had overslept, and went only at three in the morning instead of two, to wait her turn. Patiently till seven she stood in line, but there had been a greater crowd than usual before her—the food was all gone. She returned with an empty basket, weeping, for dearly she loved madame and les petites.

Marie took it hardest of all. She was the baby, only five, and delicate. She had been very ill during the autumn with a fever, and monsieur, the doctor, had said: "Madame, la petite must have more nourishments. She will not otherwise be well. She grows not strong on horse-meat, like you and myself." So she had gone from restaurant to cafe to find dainties for her darling, and brought home—what do you think? The feet, head and liver of a chicken, for which she paid nine francs—in American money nearly two dollars. This she made into a broth, paying twice a week the same price, till now the little Marie was nearly as well as ever, and sat, this day before Christmas, on the doorstep with Lisette and Adele. A handkerchief was spread out upon the steps before them, on which were three small bits of chocolate. Mamma always gave them a piece between meals to keep up their strength, and while they nibbled upon that, naturally they thought of Christmas and what it would bring.

"Marie," said Lisette, a slender, dark-eyed girl of ten, the eldest of the three, "I will tell you a secret. If you will be good and not fret the Christ-child will give us our dinner, for I am going to ask Him. Papa says He will always answer our prayers if we are good."

At the mention of their father Marie began to weep. "Ah!" sobbed she, "when will we again see our own papa, who is always to us so good? The wicked Prussians! they will kill him."

"You forget, Marie," answered Adele, in a soothing tone, "our papa has not really gone to the war. He only aids in protecting the city. He is Alsatian, and not native-born French, so he went not in the regular army."

This was somewhat reassuring, so the child wiped her eyes with her tiny handkerchief.

"See this," said Lisette. She took from her pocket a small billet, on which was written: "Dear Jesu, please give Adele, Marie and Lisette, three little girls in Paris, a nice Christmas dinner, and, if we might ask another gift, let it be a large, a very large potato!" I shall get Babette to address it," added the child, "and it will be sure—"

Just then Madame Bernard, who had been standing at an upper window looking out upon the garden, gave a shriek, then called: "Run, run, mes petites." Something dark whizzed through the air. The children flew on wings of fear into the house, not thinking what danger they had escaped. Suddenly, they were startled by the loud explosion of a bomb in the street, a large piece of which flew over the garden wall, falling on the handkerchief and the note to the Christ-child, burning them in a moment to a cinder. Babette, hearing the noise, arrived just in time to receive Marie, who, from excitement and fear, had fainted, in her arms. She was carried to the salon, where she revived under madame's skilful care. Caresses and gentle soothing words from the mother soon restored the children to their usual composure.

"And, now, mes petites, we must all be brave in these sad times. Gustave, your uncle, lies ill beyond the Seine. I have received a passport to cross over the line this afternoon, and must leave you with the good Babette. You will not, I know, go even near the door till my return." So, when the hour arrived, madam kissed them each upon both cheeks, waved a bright adieu, and left the little ones alone. A voiture took her speedily to the banks of the Seine, which she crossed on the pontoon-bridge, and soon found herself actually in the presence of the "dreadful Prussians." But terrible as they were in war, to this lovely, well-bred lady, they were all politeness. She made her short visit, finding the brother whom she sought, very ill. He was cheered by the presence of one whom he never expected to see again on earth. Their words were hurried, for she must return within the time appointed. "Gustave, adieu, if we meet not here again." She pointed upward and was gone.

As she ventured once more upon the street, a tap upon her shoulder set the blood bounding through her heart. She was in an enemy's country; on every hand danger. But she was brave, and turned to see a Prussian by her side. To her astonishment he said: "The General's compliments," and gave her a basket containing three loaves of beautifnl white German bread. It seemed a little thing, but to Madame Bernard, who had seen since the siege only government bread, (now grown so poor that it seemed made of chalk and straw, and could only be eaten when made into a pudding or fried in oil), it was a great present indeed.

"Give to monsieur, the General, a thousand thanks,"—tears glistened in her eyes,—"he knows not the good he has this day done. May his little ones never know want!" The officer, in his quarters near by, overhearing the words of gratitude, looked with pity upon the pale, delicate lady. Thinking of his own stout wife and rosy children at home, this "dreadful Prussian" actually sighed at the necessities of war. Ah! the innocent women and children must suffer for the sins of the nation.

Madame hurried through the streets of Paris on her homeward way. Half-starved women and children gathered around her, crying: "Ah, kind lady, let us but see the beautiful white bread!" Who could sympathize with them more deeply? Saying, "my poor friends, we all alike suffer. I cannot keep from you, what the good God has given me." She took one of the precious loaves, divided it into small pieces, and gave it into the hands eagerly stretched out to receive. Some ate ravenously, while others placed their morsels in pockets, to take home to those suffering more than themselves.

The early winter twilight enveloped the city in its gray mantle as the mother hastened on. She had nothing yet for the Christmas dinner but these white loaves. A savory odor from a restaurant near by caused her to linger first, and then to enter. After much bargaining she bought a small meat-pie, for which she paid the great price of thirteen francs. It could be divided only in three or four small pieces. Madame knew of what it was made. She had tasted one before. She would not even whisper it—the children might not suspect.

"Ah, Babette," said Madame Bernard, quietly entering the kitchen door so that no one might see her basket, "Look at what I have for the Christmas—" Here she paused, for Babette, the picture of despair, stood with something held close in her checked apron, the tears flowing down her face.

"Why, Babette, what have you there? Why do you weep, poor girl?"

"Madame, see, it is Bijou. Ah, the wicked man!" and she opened her apron, showing a beautiful white Angora cat. A little crimson spot upon its throat told the cruel tale. Beautiful Bijou, the children's playfellow, was dead. Babette broke out afresh: "It was the cruel Baptiste, who killed her in his anger, because the poor beast took from the table his bit of horse-meat. But I made sure he should not profit by it himself, and have just brought her home for you, madame, and les petites.

Christmas morning awoke scarcely so early as the little ones who had, with children's faith, hung their stockings beside the fireplace and hoped for gifts, as in days gone by.

"Lisette, Adele, the Christ-child has indeed remembered us," said little Marie, springing from her bed in the gray dawn, and creeping back speedily (for the morning was cold) with her stockings in her hand. "Ah!" with a little cry of delight, "see!" and out she pulled a large potato. Each of the others discovered a like treasure, and great was their rejoicing. Marie, in her innocent joy, petted it as if it had been a living thing—now poking her fingers in its many eyes, caressing it in her arms as if it were her favorite doll, and at last scrubbing it with a nail brush to make it white and clean, till there was scarcely a vestige of skin left. Then they all went to the kitchen, where they left their precious gifts to add to the Christmas dinner. The bells rang as merrily from church steeple and cathedral tower as if all Paris were not sad. Madame Bernard, for a treat, took the little ones to Notre Dame—that poem in stone, which is one of the grandest buildings in all Paris. Here they listened to the fine service, and afterward went to walk in the beautiful garden of the Tuilleries. The palace yet stood perfect in its beauty; no defacing hand had marred its walls.

Arrived at home, they found Babette in a fresh apron and white cap, waiting to announce dinner with just as grand an air as if it were really a Christmas feast of happier days. The dining-room, with its polished and waxed floor, sunny windows and tall glass vase of roses in the centre of the table, looked as cheerful as possible.

They all tried to be gay and happy, though it was, indeed, a very strange dinner for a "fete" day, or any other, for that matter. The white bread was piled up high on either side of the roses. At sight of this, Marie clasped her hands in a very dramatic way, while Adele, who first tasted her very small piece of meat-pie, shrugged her shoulders in dismay, murmuring low to Lisette: "Kats!"

"Hush! Marie must not know, and see mamma; she eats; let us, too, be brave."

Coffee and tea were unheard-of luxuries. The mother had a little stored in the cellar to be used in case of sickness. Diluted with a good deal of water, it answered the purpose. Just at this part of the dinner Babette disappeared for a moment and soon returned with a large platter, on which was—not, as in former days, a grand turkey stuffed with chestnuts, but—"Bijou;" a ruby necklace of beet encircling her throat, lying in a soft, green bed of sweet herbs. Babette always would have her box of sweet marjoram and thyme growing in a sunny window of the kitchen. Upon sight of their pet the children burst into tears, declaring they "never, never could eat a bite."

"My children," said madame, "we are all faint with hunger; we must eat or we die." She cut a small piece and tasted it. "I have before heard it was much like chicken. Eat, my little ones, and see." The mother again began to eat, setting them a noble example, while Babette rushed sobbing from the room. Her grief somewhat abated, she returned presently with the potatoes, which was their only dessert.

Now that they are grown ladies, they say, in talking of those "hard times," no omelet souffle or delicate pate ever tastes half so good as the potatoes they found in their stockings on that Christmas day.

Faith's Select, Unconquered Seed.

WITH what beauty on Time's pages
Stands that group of exiles there;
On them pours the light of ages,
As they kneel to God in prayer.
They endure, not as the stoic;
They from God protection plead;
And they rise in praise heroic,
Faith's select, unconquered seed.

See them lead the grand procession,
To it christened by the seas;
Witnessing a good confession,
Every man a Pericles;
Every man an Israel, rather,
Every man a prince with God;
Ah! what glories round them gather,
Grouped upon that icy sod!

Plain their spe
They can bo
They unfu
Bre last for fame;
P nt fever,
ash that o'er them plays;
inked to God's forever,
the Ancient One of Days.

There they kneel, the true succession,
Hebrew, Roman, Greek in one:
Of the new world take possession;
We complete their work begun.
Rise, and greet them, coming ages,
Fall behind them into line,
Kings and priests, yeoman and sages,
Girded for their task divine.

The Week of Prayer—1887.

THE Boston Ministers' Meeting has adopted the following programme of topics:

GENERAL TOPIC.—"That God would now revive His work in the churches."

Sunday, Jan. 2. The special baptism of the Holy Spirit as the divine preparation for the work. Acts 2:16–21; Acts 1:4, 5; Luke 11:13; Acts 1:8.

Monday, Jan. 3. The ministry and Church promised an enduement of power through the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Luke 24:47, 49; Acts 2:4, 37, 41; John 14:26.

Tuesday, Jan. 4. The office of the Holy Spirit to apply the truth and convict the sinner. John 16:7, 8; 1 Cor. 2:4, 5.

Wednesday, Jan. 5. The attitude of the Church — prayerful waiting upon God; cheerful co-operation with Him. Acts 10:45; Ezek. 36:37; Jer. 29:13; Ps. 110:3.

Thursday, Jan. 6. Self-examination, confession and humiliation as a preparation for revival work. 2 Chron. 7:12–16; 1 Pet. 5:8; 2 Cor. 13:5.

Friday, Jan. 7. Personal consecration —the essential human element in revival work. Rom. 12:1, 2; 1 Chron. 29:5.

Saturday, Jan. 8. Personal work for Christ, the demonstration of the sincerity of prayer for revival. Matt. 7:21; John 1:40–46.

Sunday, Jan. 9. The abiding presence of the Holy Spirit recognized and accepted as the hope and inspiration of all Christian work. John 14:15, 17; John 20:22.

SUPPLEMENTARY TOPICS—SECOND WEEK.

BASIS.—The Lord's Prayer. Luke 11:2–4. Our Father which art in heaven.

Monday, Jan. 10. Hallowed be Thy Name. Reverence. 1 Pet. 3:15, f. c.; 1 Sam. 2:30.

Tuesday, Jan. 11. Thy kingdom come. In heart, home, Church, business, social and civil life. Matt. 3:1, 2; Luke 17:21.

Wednesday, Jan. 12. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth. God's will the law of life; to be "done" by us; by all. "IN EARTH." Mark 3:35; 1 Thess. 4:3, f. c.

Thursday, Jan. 13. Give us day by day our daily bread. Temporal, spiritual. Matt. 5:6; John 6:32–35; Phil.

Friday, Jan. 14. And forgive us our for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. Matt. 6:14, 15; 18:21–38.

Saturday, Jan. 15. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil. 1 Cor. 10:13; John 17:11–15.

No License.

MASSACHUSETTS cities are again voting, at their annual elections, upon the question of licensing the sale of intoxicating liquors. Some remarkable surprises have already taken place. Of the group of seventeen cities which voted last Tuesday, thirteen had committed themselves, the year previous, policy, and four had voted st Tuesday this result was exactly reversed, and only four cities voted in favor of license. This means, of course, that nine cities have changed front upon this question. The cities Fall River, Cambridge, Haverhill, New Bedford, Gloucester, Springfield, Waltham, Northampton and Brockton. Taken together, the vote in these cities is a staggering defeat to the liquor interests, and it shows how deep and genuine is the "anti-saloon" sentiment of which some people have made light, as if it were nothing but a political trick. The cause which has produced these changes in public sentiment, and in municipal policy, is practically the same in each instance. The saloons have defied the laws, and have undertaken to control municipal politics, and citizens who are not easily aroused upon moral issues have concluded that it is time to give them notice to quit. "Our folks are over-doing this thing," said a Cambridge saloon keeper, as he emerged the other night from a ward caucus which had just nominated two saloonkeepers to the Common Council; and the average citizen has reached the same conclusion. In Cambridge, on Tuesday, there were on the tickets four saloon keepers as candidates for the Council, and one saloon keeper and one distiller among the candidates for aldermen. The people rallied to defeat the saloons in the midst of a blinding snowstorm. Only one of the six saloon candidates was elected, and the city changed its vote on license from 530 in favor to 566 against—a gain of nearly 1,100 votes on the "No" side. This victory, won by the temperance people after five successive defeats, was helped by the publication of a sharp and vigorous campaign paper, called the Frozen Truth, and filled with telling local arguments and figures. Two issues of this paper were sent to every voter—over eight thousand, and the facts were thus brought to the notice of men who could not have been reached in any other way. The churches and ministers—including one Catholic priest—co-operated, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union had members present at each of the sixteen precincts. It was a very exciting contest, and neither side engaged anticipated so great an overturn. In Fall River the victory was even more decisive, for there was an adverse majority of almost nineteen hundred to overcome, but the work was done. Now the organized saloon interests are making a desperate effort to hold their ground in the remaining cities, but the anti-saloon feeling is "in the air," and other defeats are in store for them.

These elections will strengthen the hands of those who will press the Constitutional Prohibitory amendment upon the Legislature which meets next month. Although the Republican party is definitely committed to the policy of submitting this amendment, it has not been thought likely that a sufficient vote could be had for it this time, as the Republicans do not control the required number of votes. Many sincere temperance men are convinced that the local-option system affords a better means of fighting the traffic than prohibition. The saloons in a city like Cambridge, for example, dread a No-license vote more than prohibition by State statute, because when a majority of the people voluntarily vote "No," they are apt to insist upon a more vigorous enforcement of the law than would be had if prohibition were forced upon them from without.—Boston Correspondent of The Advance.

Financial.

TUESDAY, 28th.

THE situation improves steadily. Wheat sold here yesterday for cash as follows: No. 1 red 93 1-4, extra red 92, No. 2 red 90 1-2, State white 91, No. 1 hard Duluth 95 1-2. If the price here were $1 for No. 2 red Europe would have to pay it. We hope to see quotations here at that figure before long, and wheat worth 90 cents at Chicago. As we have said before, such a price would be better for this country, for Europe, India, Australia and the world. The years of depressed trade would pass away, for the prosperity of the world depends on the prosperity of the agricultural class. European buyers are astute and self-controlled, do not often lose their heads. They will buy as low as they can, will depress and break the market when they can, and they have large means and can do much to keep prices down. European stocks of grain are low, smaller than they have been for years. The grain they must have. The visible supply was reported yesterday to be: Wheat 62,264,343 bushels, corn 12,584,605, oats 4,996,485, being an increase for the week of 804,496 bushels of wheat, 520,002 of corn, and a decrease of 120,154 bushels of oats. The supply of wheat exceeds that of Dec. 26th, 1885, by 3,800,000 bushels. The farmers have sold the crop of this year much more freely than they did that of last year. California is reported to have sold so freely as to have left only 9,600,000 bushels of wheat for shipment. European markets were reported firm yesterday. Quotations in this country were: Wheat here 90 1-2, in Chicago 77 5-8; corn here 47 5-8, in Chicago 37; oats here 34 7-8, in Chicago 26. Provisions tend upward. The closing quotations for cotton were: Dec. 9.38–40; Jan. 9.39–40; Feb. 9.51–52; March 9.63–64. The supply of hay is moderate, the demand good. Prices were yesterday: Choice timothy 80 to 85 cents, No. 1, 75 to 80, clover mixed 60 to 65. Long rye straw was worth 65 to 70 cents, oat 45 to 50.

The city banks reported loans reduced last week $5,209,600, specie increased $2,917,000, legal tenders decreased $215,300, deposits reduced $2,089,200, the surplus of reserve increased $3,224,000, making it $7,232,200. About $2,500,000 in gold was received during the week from Europe. Steamers arriving yesterday brought $4,182,783 more, making the total since August 1st about $31,525,267. To regular customers money on call on approved collateral was loaned by the banks at 6 per cent. Yesterday at the Stock Exchange the rate was from 4 to 6 per cent on call. The Bank of England rate is 5 per cent, but seems to have little effect at present on the movements of money, except as it may draw money from the continent to London.

The imports of merchandise at this port last week were valued at $7,563,690, the exports at $6,398,913. Foreign exchange sold yesterday at $4.79 1-2 for 60-day bills, and $4.83 1-2 for demand for sterling. The National Bureau of Statistics at Washington reports for November: Exports of merchandise $72,619,343, imports $54,048,815, excess of exports $18,570,528 against an excess of exports in Nov., 1885, of $16,850,106, and an excess of exports in Nov., 1884, of $33,593,254. For five months of this year—July 1st to Nov. 30th—the excess of merchandise exports over imports is $21,788,446.

The holiday trade is reported from all parts of the country to have been very large.

The immigrants arrived this year to Nov. 30th number 365,577 persons. Result—an overstocked labor market and disquietude among mechanics and laborers.

The Princeton and Yale Football Contest.

PRINCETON men protest against the reports made for the daily papers of the game played there on Thanksgiving Day between the clubs of Yale and Princeton students. One of them writes as follows to The Evangelist:

EDITOR OF THE EVANGELIST: Sir, I should like to thank you for your editorial note on the game of football played here on Thanksgiving Day. Your objection to the day, is one to which I can take no exception. As to your half jocular allusion to the "sacred blood" shed during the game, I must ask you to rectify the error which is in it by implication. There was not a drop of blood shed; the Princeton players—the only ones I know—are among the best men in Princeton College, a large number of them the leaders of every Christian work in the College, and all of them men who would rather cut off an arm than act as the New York morning newspapers represented them as acting; and the descriptions of "brutality" given by the reporters were fictitious. The men whom the reporters went to the length of naming, were absolutely innocent of anything of the sort; and the only man of the twenty-two players who indulged in any such behavior—not a Princeton man, by the way—was about the only man whose name did not get into the papers.

You may say, Why not then contradict the reports? On the day when the newspaper reports appeared, the Princeton players, by my advice, telegraphed a contradiction and protest to the Associated Press; and the telegram is now on file in the Princeton telegraph office. Not one newspaper would publish it.

I must say that it was a matter of deep regret to me that the religious press, knowing, as it does, the New York morning press pretty well, took the hook so generally, bait and all. I have no doubt that some of the reporters are still chuckling over the lashing which Princeton has received from the religious journals. And it was a satisfaction to me to find that my copy of The Evangelist, when I opened it, did not disappoint me; that if it was still harmless as a dove, it had not lost the wisdom of the serpent.

The disorder after the game was not the fault of Princeton. It came partly from the fact that Yale refused, until just before the game, to come to Princeton; so that the old town was caught almost absolutely without preparations for such a crowd; but still more from the nature of the day. Just as the game was over, the drizzling day broke into one of the wildest storms I ever saw. Everybody ran for cover, and many of the "covers" were bad ones. Imagine 6,000 wet, tired people, many of them having the physiological superstition that alcohol will keep out cold, crowded into a little village utterly unprepared to keep order, and you will have some idea of a scene which no one wants to see repeated. Even then, the characteristics of the disorder were exaggerated in the grossest fashion, and the usual "column and a half" was worked up in the highest style of the New York reporter's art. It may be journalism to give an unfledged and ambitious reporter absolute control of a great newspaper, with the practical intimation that he will not be brought to book for anything, provided he makes it "spicy." But is it religious journalism to be swift to hear, swift to speak, swift to wrath? It may be so; but I confess to preferring The Evangelist's methods. A. J.

IT IS A SUGGESTIVE FACT that so large a proportion of the ministers in our Church are the sons of ministers. In one of our seminaries, where a special record has been kept for twenty years, it is shown by statistics that nearly twenty per cent of all the students under training came from ministerial homes. Nor are these homes to be found in our great cities, or in connection with prominent pastorates; with hardly an exception, these candidates came directly from the ranks of our working clergy in village and country. A very large proportion of them are said to come from Home Missionary fields, where they have seen and felt the severest trials of clerical life, but where they have also caught the blessed inspirations of that life, and have learned to prize the ministry as the most elevated, the most satisfying of earthly avocations.—The Evangelist.

An Unqualified Indorsement.

When a business firm comes boldly forward and makes a public declaration in the leading papers of the country, and again and again repeats its statements before the eyes of millions of readers, it is fair to presume that the methods of business pursued by that house will bear the most thorough and closest investigation which has been so openly courted. It is said by those who have had constant dealings for years with The Great American Tea Company, 31 and 33 Vesey Street, New York city, that its remarkable inducements in the way of beautiful and valuable presents, to be given away to every purchaser, are always carried out to the letter and are fully worthy the high reputation the firm has made during the past thirty years. In fact the high standing of the Company is too well known to require any comment from us. It is enough for us to say that they sell only pure and perfect goods, and that is a great deal in this age of adulteration. We advise all our readers to give their goods a trial and enjoy a cup of perfect tea or coffee.

Practical Science.

It is a practical science of no mean importance that relieves housekeeping of its drudgery. This is accomplished in the kitchen, the laundry, and housecleaning by the use of James Pyle's Pearline, a purely scientific article, which has in a few years become a necessity to many families. We advise our patrons to try it. Pearline does its work easily and quickly, and is harmless to fabric or hands; but don't tamper with any of its numerous imitators, they are dangerous.

Market Report.

Review of the New York Market for Butter, Cheese, etc. Reported by David W. Lewis & Co., Produce Commission Merchants, 49 Pearl St., New York. Commission on Butter, Eggs, Poultry, etc., is 5 ₰ cent; Flour, Grain, etc., 2½ ₰ cent. Marking-plates furnished when desired.

NEW YORK, December 24, 1886.

BUTTER.—Receipts for the week, 23,455 pks.; exports about 2,000 pks.

It has been a very busy week here—Christmas gifts and well-wishing have been going gloriously on all the week. Wholesale markets have, perhaps, been left a little in the lurch, and trade in butter has been only moderate. But there has been a good fall business all through, and the season's make is probably more generally marketed than at the same time for many years back. In winter the West "takes the cake" in the butter market—their grain-fed, heavy-bodied butter, full flavored and fresh from the churn, has a decided lead among buyers. Such goods are now saleable here, and scarcely enough to go round at 32a33c. Eastern creameries are more variable in price, but have been mostly all taken. Fine New York State creamery firkins sold here at 23a23½c., and 25c. was asked for some retail selections. Fair to good wintry made N. Y. State tubs sold at 18a22c., with selections of fine quality running up to 25c. During the week there were sales of upwards of a thousand packages of held Western creamery butter for export at about 20c. The market closes firm. We quote:

Grain-fed Western creamery, churny flavor	32 @33
Fresh, churny flavor, Eastern creameries	25 @30
Fancy fresh dairy selections	25 @27
Winter make dairy, fair to good	18 @22
N. Y. State dairies entire, good to fine	22 @24
do do common to fair	18 @22
do creamery firkins	22 @24
Western creamery, early makes	15 @22
Butter, poor to common	10 @15

CHEESE.—Receipts for five days, 13,085 boxes; exports about 7,000 boxes.

Finest cheese have ruled dull all the week, exporters taking very little and home trade buying only from hand to mouth. Holders, however, are firm and refuse to sell for less than 13c. After leaving these top qualities there was good trading in all other grades, fair to good fresh creams selling at 11 a12½c., partly skimmed at 9a10½c., and full skimmed State cheese at 6a8c. Pennsylvania skims were in light receipt and sold at 3a4c. We quote:

Factory, colored, full cream, finest	12¾@13
do white, do do	12¾@13
do good to fine do do	12 @12½
do night milk skims	10 @11
do skims	3 @ 9

EGGS.—Receipts for five days, 4,011 bbls.

The market has ruled steady for strictly fresh eggs, and they have sold quick on arrival at full prices. Held fresh lots have improved a trifle, but limed have been dull and irregular in prices. We quote:

Near-by strictly fresh laid, per doz	28 @29
N. Y. State, held stock, per doz	24 @26
Canada and Western, per doz	24 @26
Limed eggs, per doz	18 @19

FILKINS.—At Saratoga Springs, on Saturday, Dec. 11, of typhoid fever, May S., daughter of E. V. and Emma Filkins, of Berne, N. Y., on the dawn of her 18th year.

Consecrated to God in her infancy and nurtured in the atmosphere of a Christian home, it was but natural to witness in this young woman the fruits of early piety. When but 13 years of age she connected herself with the Reformed Church of Berne by a public profession of her faith in Christ. The same traits which marked her earlier years characterized her youthful womanhood and shone brightly in her daily life. Both in the home of her parents and in the society of others, the brightness and vivacity of her nature were conspicuous, and no cloud seemed to intervene between her and the sunlight of a happy life. Two years ago she became a pupil of the Temple Grove Seminary at Saratoga, N. Y., and was in the year of her graduation when death suddenly overtook her. In the home of her uncle and aunt, she was an only daughter, dutiful and affectionate, and by them the saparation is most keenly realized. The lessons of filial piety and the duties of Christian discipleship were strictly maintained in this home of her adoption, so that the savor of her example still remains in the Sabbath-school and church and among her schoolmates and friends. In her, the seed sown, held the germs of an immortal growth, which will eternally bloom in the paradise of God.

"Oh, no, this is not dying,
Thou Saviour of mankind!
There streams of love are flowing,
No hindrance ever knowing;
Here drops alone we find." R. D.

ANOTHER WORKMAN FALLEN.

DEMAREST.—In the INTELLIGENCER of the 15th inst. there appeared a series of resolutions adopted by the Consistory of the Reformed Church of Bergen, N. J., relative to the departure to his home beyond the river of Elder Cornelius A. Demarest. Will you permit me to give a word of testimony to my friend and co-laborer of former days?

He was born in this city. His boyhood and youth were passed in Nyack, whither his parents had removed. He made confession of his faith and united with the church in Nyack when he was 18 years old, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Hageman. He at once entered with his whole heart into Christian work in the prayer-meeting and the Sabbath-school. He continued in it. He never put off the harness, but died with it on. As expressive of his brethren's appreciation of his character and of the quality of his work, he had served for several terms as deacon, and as superintendent of the large Subbath-school in the Church of Harlem, and had been superintendent of the Sabbath-school and was an acting elder in the Church of Bergen, when he suddenly fell in his steps and entered into rest. He diligently maintained his family devotions amid all the thorny experiences of his life. He loved the prayer-meeting, and always contributed to its interest by prayer or exhortation as opportunity offered. He was, in short, an honest, earnest, unassuming, conscientious servant of Christ, his Master, and was never happier than when doing, according to his ability, something for Jesus. The Church of Christ needs more such men, who are Christians every day in the week, and in all the interests and relations of life; men who exemplify their conviction that "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

May the Holy Comforter pour the oil and the wine into the wounded hearts of his loved ones, and incline all who knew him to listen to the voice that comes from his empty place in the church, the prayer-meeting, the Sabbath-school and the home: "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.

Ayer's Hair Vigor keeps the hair soft and pliant, imparts to it the lustre and freshness of youth, causes it to grow luxuriantly, eradicates Dandruff, cures all scalp diseases, and is the most cleanly of all hair preparations.

AYER'S Hair Vigor has given me perfect satisfaction. I was nearly bald for six years, during which time I used many hair preparations, but without success. Indeed, what little hair I had, was growing thinner, until I tried Ayer's Hair Vigor. I used two bottles of the Vigor, and my head is now well covered with a new growth of hair. —Judson B. Chapel, Peabody, Mass.

HAIR that has become weak, gray, and faded, may have new life and color restored to it by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. My hair was thin, faded, and dry, and fell out in large quantities. Ayer's Hair Vigor stopped the falling, and restored my hair to its original color. As a dressing for the hair, this preparation has no equal.—Mary N. Hammond, Stillwater, Minn.

VIGOR, youth, and beauty, in the appearance of the hair, may be preserved for an indefinite period by the use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. A disease of the scalp caused my hair to become harsh and dry, and to fall out freely. Nothing I tried seemed to do any good until I commenced using Ayer's Hair Vigor. Three bottles of this preparation restored my hair to a healthy condition, and it is now soft and pliant. My scalp is cured, and it is also free from dandruff.—Mrs. E. R. Foss, Milwaukee, Wis.

Reassurance.

THROUGH scalding tears I fiercely strove to see
If there was any light—a little ray—
Any poor sign that I should ever be
From my dark path led to a clearer way.

For t[illegible] yoke pressed harder—I grew sore
Wit[illegible] eferred and fruitless toil and loss;
And, a[illegible]ered with the weight I bore,
It see[illegible]uld no further bear my cross.

The fain[illegible] the way was at my heart:
"Is there[illegible] nore to live for?" now I cried.
"My hopes,[illegible] nds, my early faiths depart,
And bitt[illegible]s, I would escape, abide."

And gropin[illegible] weariness for rest,
I saw, mic[illegible] of grevious human [illegible]
That there w[illegible]e, the
Who bore

I saw [illegible]
[illegible]s with a friend unseen,
[illegible] a tender soul, through one dear name,
[illegible]ight and storm, submissive and serene.

And to myself I said, "If these can bear
So much with patient mind, why may not I?
Why should not I the blessed spirit share
Of those who nobly live, yet daily die?"

And a strange power possessed me—entered in
With light and balm my bruised, repining heart;
And then I knew it was the Christ within.
That courage gave and shield to evil art.

And so I took my burden up again,
Made easy by a stronger hand than mine,
And learned that every earthly loss and sting of pain,
By love transfigured, makes one's life divine.

"The Man in the Office Knows."

A Colorado Mining Lesson.

SOME visitors were passing through a Colorado smelter. Men were wheeling ores of different kinds and colors into the large furnace-sheds. Yellow lead-carbonate, rich glittering galena, green malachite, blue azurite, and dark iron ores, all combined in different proportions with silver and gold, were crowded in one upon another. The minerals were from all parts of the Rocky Mountains, now brought together in a variegated heap weighing hundreds of tons.

The visitors went on to see the furnaces. There the mixed ores were being cast into the yawning mouths of the fire-pits. Limestone and fuel were also thrown in to feed the fire, and to aid in separating the metals from the dross. A laborer was asked the question, "Why do you mix everything in this way?" The reply came, "That we may have the best results. We can do better with mixed ores than we can by smelting them separately." "By what method do you get the best results?" He answered, "The easiest and cheapest ways of separating the metal from the slag." "What will the metal be worth? What will be the real result of the work?" "We cannot tell. The man in the office knows."

The visitors passed on. They saw the precious metals drawn from the furnaces and placed in molds. They went into the room where the bullion bricks were taken from the molds and piled up for shipping to a refinery. The men in the bullion-room were asked the question, "How much is this bullion worth?" The answer came, with a smile: "We sometimes tell the visitors what we think it is worth; but the man in the office knows."

Here is a large smelter, employing many men who carry on their work by faith, not knowing the results any more than those who have served God "not having received the promises (the results), but having seen them afar off." Men are ordered to wheel the ore and dump it on the floor. They unquestioningly obey, not knowing the value of what they handle. Men stand at the mouths of the many furnaces, and throw in fuel and flux and mineral, as they are directed, without asking a question about the worth of the metal that is drawn off in the room beneath them. Other men handle the bullion as they would handle so many bars of pig-iron, simply because they are ordered to do that part of the work. The full knowledge of the processes and results is not among the workmen. "The man in the office knows."

It is easy to see the absolute necessity of faith and obedience among the laborers in every machine-shop and foundry, as well as in every smelter of our land; and yet, now and then, one of the same laborers will question about rendering faith and obedience in the Christian life. It seems strange that any person should find difficulty in accepting this common-sense lesson of the Colorado smelter. The steady perseverance in trusting and serving God must be infinitely [illegible]easonable than the faith and obedience of "smelter men."—Rev. W. D. Westervelt, in The Sunday-School Times.

Folds or Powers?

A PAPER read before the General Congregationalist Council, held in Chicago recently, declared that "American Congregationalist ministers have almost lost the art of effecting the conversion of men," and that "Baptists and Methodists are conspicuously the evangelizing sects." Presbyterians, and "even the Episcopalians are outstripping the Congregationalists in evangelistic work." We hope all this is not true. It is encouraging to know that [illegible]own Church activity is clear to Congregationalists, [illegible]hat Presbyterians and "Episcopalians" are not [illegible] The same paper mourns because too many [illegible]ches are established and maintained more as [illegible]ds for the flock than as bases of operations for the great work of evangelization." This last is a vital suggestion, and all the more valuable because said by a friend of the churches. There can be no doubt that the Church's social power was in God's plan, but, as in all the supreme blessings of human life, a counterpart danger lurks. The home is the unit in human organization, and that unit, baptized and glorified, goes to build up the Church of Christ among men. We know men and women so absorbed in their homes that they have little or nothing left for the Church. The Church, too, may be so self-absorbed that it does little work beyond its own walls, save in the easier matter of giving something of cash from its abundance. There can be no doubt that all Christian churches should be centres of abounding labors for neglected men, and for "compelling" those who prefer to be "neglected." We know churches which are merely great social machines, with their social "sets," parties, receptions, wedding-form traditions, and stylish funeral fashions. It is far better to crystallize even social matters around a church nucleus rather than about godless centres; but a Church which is social solely, and is in no respect a religious power, is a sad spectacle. Some churches give like princes to many good causes, and thereby seek to delegate to others their duty in actual work. Our Congregationalist friends utter a vital warning against maintaining temples solely as "folds." The world needs just such folds, but the door must not be locked against fresh comers. It must not be forgotten that while Christ is represented as a shepherd of folds He breasts the storms and seeks for "the other sheep which are not of this fold," and He even gives His life for the sheep. Seeking is as much as, and more than, mere folding. The Church is at this hour doing more than ever before, but the unconquered field remains so large that good men's hearts would fail had they not a Divine shepherd as exemplar and reward.—Northwestern Christian Advocate.

an. 9th.—"Sin and Death."—Gen. 3: 1-6 and 17-19.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"By one man sin entered into the world and death by sin."—ROM. 5: 12.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—"By one man's disobedience many were made sinners."—ROM. 5: 19.

Introduction.

THE first chapter of Genesis, with the three verses at the beginning of the second, forms the introduction to the entire Bible. In the second chapter we have an account of man's first home, characterized as it was by beauty, love, innocence and happiness. With the third chapter the shadow of sin creeps over the scene, and the remainder of revelation is occupied with the conflict between God and sin, culminating in the glorious victory of God as described in the Apocalypse. The question of the origin of evil is a puzzling and unprofitable one. We do not need to go behind the story which gives the account of its first entrance into the human heart. The entire chapter ought to be considered in connection with our lesson.

The Lesson.

I. THE TEMPTATION.—VS. 1-5.

V. 1.—"Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field." This subtilty of the serpent must be the quality that Jesus commended when He said, "Be ye wise as serpents." Satan evidently employed a serpent, or assumed the form of one for the purpose of this temptation, more probably the former. "And he said unto the woman." With her slight acquaintance with animal life it may not have been a surprising thing to her to hear an animal using articulate speech. "Yea, hath God said?" This question, calling attention to the one prohibition which constituted the test of character for the first pair, artfully suggested a doubt as to the exact justice or kindness of the command.

V. 2.—"We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden." The woman thinks first of the ample provision for every want which the Creator had made, and if she had stopped there would have been saved from the temptation, but she went on to speak of the one limitation which was beginning to assume new aspects in her eyes.

V. 3.—"But of the tree that is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it." Assuming the existence of evil before the creation of man, and man's moral character as able to choose between good and evil, we see the necessity for some test in an opportunity for such a choice. This test was made as easy as possible for man, and instead of being a hardship was in reality an act of infinite mercy. If man in his innocence could not resist temptation under those circumstances, his fall into sin under the ordinary conditions of life was inevitable without the provision for his redemption, which this plan of God involved. "Lest ye die." The first rebellion against God separated man from his Maker, and so involved him in death, which began to exercise its power as soon as the sin was committed.

V. 4.—"Ye shall not surely die." This was a direct contradiction of the Almighty, and ought to have sufficed to put the woman on her guard. Satan always shows his cloven foot, if we will only look for it. This lie was all the more seductive because it had the form of truth.

V. 5.—"God doth know." Satan now suggests that God is jealous of His creatures prerogatives, and fearful lest they should rise to a position where they might challenge His supremacy. "Ye shall be as gods." It is uncertain whether this word should be regarded as indefinite, as in our version, or as referring to the Almighty Himself. In the Revision it is translated "God."

II. THE SIN.—V. 6.

V. 6.—It does not take many words to tell this story so fraught with consequences. "When the woman saw." She first parleyed with the tempter, listening to his insinuations and arguing the matter with him. This was the first step in a dangerous way. She looked upon the tree. Doubtless, at the suggestion of the tempter, went close to it, while he sounded its praises. She felt desire for the benefits supposed to follow upon the eating of the fruit. Then she took, ate, and gave to her husband. With all allowances for the subtle form of the tempation, and the inexperience of the woman, she knew that she was preferring the words of another to the commands of God, and that in eating this fruit she was disobeying a plain and emphatic command of her Maker.

III. THE PUNISHMENT.—VS. 17-19.

The lesson omits the verses from 7-16, but we need to glance over them in order to have the closing verses of the selection in their true connection. The first result and punishment of their sin was a sense of shame. They wished to hide from each other and from God. Then followed the attempt to parry God's queries and to shift the blame from themselves. When God had heard their story, He began to declare the consequence of their sin, beginning with the tempter as the most guilty one of all. The curse upon the tempter contains the promise of the Redeemer, so that the hope of forgiveness was held out to the sinners before they received the sentence due to them. To Adam and his wife God declared that they should feel the approaches of death, to which they were now subject, in pains and weariness of body.

V. 17.—"Unto Adam he said." The sin of Adam is regarded as of a more representative character than that of the woman, and the curse pronounced upon him is more comprehensive. "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife." He knew her origin, and was inexcusable for preferring her request to the command of God. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake." "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together." The entire course of nature seems to have been disturbed by the sin of man. "In sorrow shalt thou eat of it." The work of tending the garden of Eden must have been a constant delight, but now there was to commence a struggle for existence which would be desperate and life-long.

V. 18.—"Thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee." The spontaneous products of the soil had been all very good; now the earth rebels against its master, as he had rebelled against his Maker. Cultivation of the most laborious kind is now needed in order to make the earth support her children. "Thou shalt eat the herb of the field." This seems like a revocation of the former grant (1: 29), and the reducing of human life to almost a level with the animal creation.

V. 19.—"In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." Those who expect to find their living without effort of some kind, hope to be exempted without cause from the universal law of life through labor. Even those most favored in circumstances feel the weight of this curse upon them. "Till thou return unto the ground." Here we have a specific declaration of the fact of human dissolution. The translation of Enoch and Elijah intimates what might have been the manner of man's exit from this earthly life if sin had not brought death into the world.
